Mr. HOAR presented resolutions of the legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, relative to the navigation of the Connecticut River; which were read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

[Commonwealth of Massachusetts. In the year 1896.]

Resolutions relative to the navigation of the Connecticut River.

Whereas it is desirable that the attention of Congress should be called to the urgent need of reopening the Connecticut River, running through the States of Massachusetts and Connecticut, to navigation, as far up said river as the cities of Springfield and Holyoke in said Commonwealth, for the following reasons:

First. Because the reestablishing of navigation on the Connecticut River will restore to said river the shipping industry that formerly made up a large part of the business of Springfield.

Second. Because the Connecticut River is the largest and most important river in New England.

Third. Because navigation on the Connecticut River would enable the General Government to reach by water its arsenal and armory at Springfield.

Fourth. Because, by the opening of navigation on said river, the General Government would save thousands of dollars annually in freight charges.

Fifth. Because, by making said river navigable, millions of dollars would be saved in freight charges to the people living along its banks.

Sixth. Because it would benefit a territory populated by more than 500,000 inhabitants.

Seventh. Because it would advance the prosperity of a section of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts that is increasing in population with marked rapidity.

Eighth. Because, by removing the present obstructions that impede navigation as well as the natural flow of the river, the health of the people living along its borders would be less liable to the dangers of malaria, resulting from the overflow of the said river in the spring of the year, caused by said obstructions.

Ninth. Because, by making said river navigable, it would again furnish an inexhaustible supply of shad and other migratory fish, which formerly contributed to the yield of food for the inhabitants, and which are now totally unknown in its waters on account of said impediments to navigation; and Tenth. Because said Connecticut River being a natural water highway, the people's rights to its use as such should not only be protected, but such improvements should be made as would make more valuable their inherent rights to such a highway.

Resolved, That our Commonwealth can not be true to herself if she remains silent or inactive when her rights are encroached upon by acts within or without her borders.

Resolved, That the people of this Commonwealth have just cause of complaint on account of the existing impediments to navigation on the Connecticut River, inasmuch as said river is a navigable body of water, in law as it would be in fact, were it not for the artificial obstructions placed in the way of such navigation.

Resolved, That the inactivity of our Commonwealth in protecting the inherent rights of her citizens in the great water highway which she has recently taken under her protection is a manifest injustice to those citizens who would save millions of dollars by the opening of said river to navigation.

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use their best endeavors to urge upon Congress the importance and justice of reopening the Connecticut River to navigation as far up as the cities of Springfield and Holyoke.

Resolved, That the secretary of the Commonwealth be requested to forward a copy of these resolutions, properly attested, to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

In senate, adopted February 3, 1896.

In house of representatives, adopted, in concurrence, February 6, 1896.

A true copy. Attest:

WM. M. OLIN,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. HOAR. I present a petition to which I desire to call the attention of the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL]. It is the petition of Marie A. Shipley, of New York City, now residing in Lugano, Switzerland, who is a very learned investigator and historical student, praying that the 24th of June, the anniversary of the discovery of the North American coast by the Cabots in 1497, be made a national holiday.

My question is as to what committee the petition should properly go. There is one measure at least before the Judiciary Committee proposing to establish a national holiday, a bill which the Senator from New York himself introduced. Another one has come from the Committee on the Library. It seems to me that all these measures should go to one place. I will have the petition referred to the Committee on the Judiciary unless some other course be suggested.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on the Library used to have all such measures.

Mr. HILL. I think this petition should go to the Committee on the Judiciary, and at the same time I suggest to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] that his bill relating to the establishment of Lincoln's birthday as a holiday should also be committed to the Judiciary Committee, where the whole subject can be examined, if the Senator from North Dakota has no objection to that course.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The bill referred to by the Senator from New York is already on the Calendar, having been reported by the Committee on the Library. I have no objection, however, to its going to the Committee on the Judiciary if it is the desire that the legal aspect of the measure shall be considered.

Mr. HILL. If the Senator will make that motion, we might dispose of it now, if there is no objection.

Mr. HALE. I do not know that there is any objection, and yet these bills have heretofore been before the Committee on the Library. The Lincoln holiday bill was sent to that committee, and that committee considered it and it was reported to the Senate and went to the Calendar, where I propose to ask the Senate very soon to take it up. It would have been passed on the 12th but for the single objection of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], who has views upon increasing the number of holidays. Under these circumstances, I see no reason why the bill should run the gauntlet of any other committee, it having already passed through the committee that ordinarily has charge of such measures. I propose to ask the Senate, perhaps to-day, to take up the Lincoln holiday bill as reported from the Committee on the Library, and therefore at present I do not feel like assenting that it be sent anywhere else.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Maine will permit me to suggest that I think it will facilitate action upon the bill to which he refers to have it sent to the Judiciary Committee. I do not say what action would be taken, but it would facilitate some disposition of it. As to the form of the bill, it strikes me that it is not in correct shape. There is considerable question as to the propriety if not the power of the United States to create a public holiday except so far as concerns the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States.

All bills relating to the subject of national holidays passed prior to 1894 relate simply to the District of Columbia and constitute part of the Revised Statutes applicable to that District. In 1894 Congress passed a law relating to Labor Day which does not seem to be limited to the District of Columbia. That is the only exception. I do not know what committee reported it, but no very great attention was paid to the passage of that bill. I introduced a bill the other day relating to Jackson's birthday, which has gone to the Judiciary Committee. I should assume that the Committee on the Library would be disposed to regard a bill relating to the establishment of a legal holiday as properly belonging to the Judiciary Committee.

The petition which the Senator from Massachusetts has just presented in reference to another holiday goes to the Judiciary Committee. The Jackson birthday bill is before that committee. My suggestion was not made in hostility at all to the bill when I suggested to the Senator from North Dakota that his bill might with propriety be committed to that committee for such consideration as the Judiciary Committee propose to give it. That is all I have to suggest at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection to the request of the Senator from New York.

Mr. HALE. I have stated that I object for the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands. The petition presented by the Senator from Massachusetts will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Waukesha, Wis., praying for the enactment of a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association of Milwaukee, Wis., praying for the establishment of a department of manufactures; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

He also presented a petition of the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association of Milwaukee, Wis., praying for the passage of the Torrey bankruptcy bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee, Wis., praying for the speedy completion of the harbor of refuge at that port; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a joint resolution of the general assembly of the State of Ohio, concerning the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people of each State; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution. Concerning the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people of each State.

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Ohio, That the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America be memorialized as follows: The general assembly of the State of Ohio respectfully requests the Congress of the United States to submit a constitutional amendment providing for the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the qualified electors of each State of the Union.

The general assembly believes that such an amendment to the national Constitution will result in each State having at all times a full representation in the national Senate, will prevent protracted and disturbing contests for membership therein, and will prevent all attempts to influence improperly or corruptly the selection of members to the national Senate.

The general assembly believes that as all political power in the United States comes from the people, that the sole right to select all legislative officers should by the Constitution be vested directly in the people.

Resolved, That the governor is hereby respectfully requested to forward a duly authenticated copy of this memorial, under the great seal of this State, to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State, in order that the same may be brought to the attention of the Congress of the United States.

CHARLES H. BOSLER,
Speaker pro tempore of the House of Representatives.
ASAHEL W. JONES,
President of the Senate.

ASA S. BUSHNELL, Governor.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a joint resolution of the general assembly of the State of Ohio, praying for the restoration of duty on wool; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution on the singling of wool for the free list.

Whereas the singling out of wool for the free list in the present tariff law has proven a calamity of appalling proportions to the sheep husbandry of the United States, which should be rectified by the present Congress by the reimposition of a duty on that staple: Therefore

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Ohio, That our Senators and Representatives from Ohio in the National Congress, now assembled, are hereby requested to use all honorable means by influence and vote to secure the passage of the House bill which restores 60 per cent on the schedule in the McKinley bill on wools and woolen goods.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to our delegation in Congress.

DAVID L. SLEEPER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
ASAHEL W. JONES,
President of the Senate.

He also, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2001) authorizing the sale of title of the United States to certain tracts of land in the District of Columbia to Margaret Shugrue, Caroline Lochboehler, and John R. Scott, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I am also directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1707) defining the qualifications of chief inspector and deputy inspectors of plumbing in the District of Columbia, to submit an adverse report thereon.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN] to the bill just reported by him in reference to plumbing and the qualifications necessary for a man to be appointed a plumber in this District. What I ask is that that bill be placed upon the Calendar instead of being postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I have no objection to its going upon the Calendar.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to state that there are hundreds of thousands of men engaged in that calling in this country who are intensely interested in the bill, and I think they ought to have a chance to be heard in some way, if necessary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. MCMILLAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1786) for the relief of the legal representatives of John H. Crane, deceased, submitted an

Mr. PLATT. I am also instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 501) to require the judge of the southern district of Florida to reside in Jacksonville, Fla., to report it adversely. I call the attention of the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] to this report.

Mr. CALL. I could not hear the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PLATT. It is an adverse report. The Committee reports favorably upon the bill repealing the law which requires the district judge to live at Key West, and adversely upon the bill introduced by the Senator from Florida, requiring the judge of the southern district to reside in Jacksonville.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator if he will please state the ground upon which the adverse report was made? Jacksonville is the principal point, and I introduced the bill at the request of the——

Mr. PLATT. We can scarcely discuss the bill now. The bill may go to the Calendar if the Senator desires.

Mr. CALL. Let it be placed on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. DANIEL, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 268) for the erection of a public building for the use of the custom-house and post-office at Newport News, in the district of Newport News, Va., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to which was referred the petition of Henry A. Du Pont, of the State of Delaware, claiming a seat in the Senate from that State, have had the same under consideration, and instruct me to report the resolution which I send to the desk, and recommend its passage. I accompany the resolution with a report, and ask that the report, without reading, may be printed in the RECORD for the convenience of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. And also as a document.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. And also as a document, as a matter of course.

I give notice that I shall call the resolution up for consideration at as early a date as may seem to suit the convenience of the Senate, other matters being considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution appended to the report will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That Henry A. Du Pont is entitled to a seat in the Senate from the State of Delaware for the full term commencing March 4, 1895.

Mr. PALMER. In connection with the report submitted by the Senator from Oregon, I wish to state that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], who is not present this morning, will ask consent to present a report expressing the views of the minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections; and after conference with the Senator from Oregon, I believe it is understood that the Senator from Indiana may file that report, and that the reports be printed together.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I have delayed presenting the report for some two or three days for the accommodation of the Senator from Indiana, but I presume, for some unavoidable reason, he is detained from the Senate to-day. I shall not therefore ask to have my report printed until the Senator from Indiana is ready to submit the views of the minority.

Mr. COCKRELL. And then let them be printed together in the RECORD and in document form.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Yes; in both forms.

Mr. HARRIS. Had the Senator not better withhold his report until the views of the minority can go into the RECORD? Otherwise, his report will have to lie upon the table until the views of the minority are filed.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I will state that if the Senator from Indiana does not come in during the day I shall withdraw the report.

Mr. GRAY. That is all right, then.

Mr. PALMER. I may be allowed to state that I think the Senator from Indiana has his report ready, and I suppose some accident prevents his being here this morning.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that he withhold the request to have the report printed in the RECORD at present, and renew it when the views of the minority are ready, so that both may appear together.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I have just stated, I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts, that unless the Senator from Indiana comes in during the day I shall withhold the request for the printing of the report in the RECORD.

Mr. TURPIE entered the Chamber.

Mr. HOAR. I see the Senator from Indiana is now here.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the fact that I just now submitted the report in the Du Pont case, stating that I desired to have the report and the views of the minority printed together in the RECORD and also as a document.

Mr. TURPIE. I will state to the honorable Senator that the report of the minority is not quite finished. I expect to finish it to-day, however, and shall submit it at least to-morrow.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Then I ask that the whole matter be laid over until to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be withdrawn as requested.

Mr. HAWLEY. While I state that I present the bill by request, I ask leave to say that it is without prejudice whatever to the bill. We have many projects of this kind, and out of them I hope we shall get something satisfactory. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 2131) to correct the military record of Charles A. Wahl; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BLANCHARD introduced a bill (S. 2132) for the relief of settlers upon lands within the indemnity limits of the grant to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will state that this bill was drawn by the Commissioner of the General Land Office upon a recommendation to that effect by the Secretary of the Interior, and its purpose is to give relief to certain deserving citizens in Louisiana who had settled upon imdemnity limits within the grant claimed by the New Orleans Pacific Railway under an order issued by the Interior Department when Mr. Lamar was Secretary of the Interior opening those lands to settlement.

Subsequently it was found that those very lands so settled had been selected by the railroad company under its grant, and in a contest between the settlers and the railroad company the settlers were defeated. A great injustice would be perpetrated upon them if this bill or a similar measure is not enacted into law. I move that the bill be referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURROWS introduced a bill (S. 2133) granting a pension to Mary E. Ely; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PROCTOR submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

SAC AND FOX INDIAN SCHOOL IN IOWA.

Mr. GEAR. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the Indian appropriation bill when it shall be presented. I ask that the amendment be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs with the request to that committee to refer the amendment to the Indian Bureau for report.

It is, in brief, a proposition that Congress shall appropriate $35,000 in the Indian appropriation bill for the purpose of establishing an Indian school at an Indian reservation in the State in which I live and represent in part. There is in that State, and has been for over fifty years, a small branch of the Sac and Fox Indians who were not in harmony with the Indians who, under Black Hawk, made war against the American people in 1832. They strayed off, leaving the main body, and went west of the Missouri River and purchased with their own money, received from the Government for their share of their land, a couple of sections or such a matter in Tama County, in my State. The Government has always had an agency at this small reservation, if I may so use the word, but the Indians have never had the advantage of any school. Those Indians now number 400, and they are gradually increasing in number. They had, in 1892, 80 children of school age; they had last year 117 children.

To my mind it is most desirable that the Government should take some action and establish a school at that place. The good people of my State who are interested in the education of Indians, the people called the Indian Rights Association, have kindly taken this matter up and they present it to Congress through me. They have had a talk with the officers of the Indian Bureau, who are highly favorable to it. This is my only reason for detaining the Senate. I merely want to say further about the moral condition of those people that it is most deplorable, and the only way we can make them better in future, it seems to me, is by taking the rising generation and teaching them as we teach other Indians in Indians schools, in order that eventually they may become self-supporting.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and printed.

THE COTTON-BOLL WEEVIL.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed to the Agricultural appropriation bill. I ask that the amendment be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

For investigating the spread and devastation of the cotton-boll weevil (Anthonomus grandis) and for experiments looking to its destruction and eradication, $100,000.

Mr. BLANCHARD. This matter has been called to my attention by the president of the Cotton Exchange of the city of New Orleans. I hold in my hand certain letters received by him and referred by him to me, which I ask, together with the amendment, be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

This Mexican weevil, it seems from these letters, is a new enemy of the cotton plant that has appeared during the past season in southern and western Texas, and its depredations have been such that the cotton attacked by it has not been worth the picking. The farmers have discovered that the poison which exterminates other insect pests has had no effect upon this new enemy and that the weevil has extended rapidly.

It is further stated in these letters that those who are in a position to observe closely the ravages of the Mexican weevil fear that another season will witness a considerable advance in the pest in the direction of the other cotton States. If unarrested the weevil will rapidly increase and extend its ravages in new directions, so that in time the entire cotton belt will be pretty certain to be affected.

It is further stated that how to arrest the ravages of this new enemy of cotton is now the problem which is worrying the cotton interests. The Mexican weevil, while as yet confined to a portion of Texas, is actually a menace to the entire cotton belt. Hence it is considered that the matter is a fit subject for national legislation.

This new enemy of the cotton plant originated in Mexico, beyond the Rio Grande, and so great were its ravages in that section that cotton planting there was abandoned. It has now transferred its operations across the Rio Grande into the counties of southwestern Texas, and its ravages are rapidly extending, so that it would seem that this proposed legislation is timely.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and printed.

CONDITION OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. ALLEN. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate of the amount of money in the Treasury on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1889, including the gold reserve of $100,000,000, and the amount of money in the Treasury on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1893, including the gold reserve of $100,000,000, and if there was a decrease of the revenue between said dates, and the amount and cause thereof.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection to the facts which the Senator from Nebraska inquires for, but it seems to me it is a little unusual to ask the Secretary of the Treasury to state his opinion on the disputed political question what is the cause of the diminution of the revenues of the United States. I hope the Senator will strike out the words "and cause."

Mr. ALLEN. That is satisfactory. Let the words "and cause" be stricken out, so that it will read "and the amount thereof."

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection to the resolution in that form.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

LAND PATENTS TO BOND-AIDED RAILROADS.

Mr. ALLEN. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to suspend the further issuance of patents for lands granted by acts of Congress in aid of the construction of what are commonly known as "the bond-aided railroads of the United States" to such roads, their grantees, or assignees, as are in arrears to the Government until the accounts thereof with the Government shall have been settled and their condition fully determined by act of Congress or other competent authority.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Let it go over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over and be printed.

EMPLOYMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. PLATT submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the stenographer employed to report the hearing before the Committee on Patents of parties interested in the bill (S. 1453) for the relief of Daniel Drawbaugh be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

FUR SEALS IN BERING SEA.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to send to the Senate copies of the reports made by the agents, officers, or persons acting under the authority of the Secretary or the Department of the Treasury in the years 1894 and 1895, which reports relate to the condition of the fur seals on the Pribilof Islands, or to the hunting of such animals in Bering Sea, or in the North Pacific Ocean, and the effect of such hunting upon the fur seals that resort to Bering Sea.

PRINTING OF TREATIES.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the treaty of 1850, known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and Articles XX to XXVIII, both inclusive, of the treaty of February 11, 1860, between Great Britain and Nicaragua, and the treaty of 1867 between the United States and Nicaragua, be printed together as a document for the use of the Senate.

COLUMBIA RIVER SALMON FISHERIES.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I present a resolution, which I ask may be read and lie on the table. I give notice that I shall call it up at an early day for the purpose of submitting some remarks upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whereas the salmon-fishing industry of the Columbia River is one of vast magnitude, the pack of last year amounting to 655,410 cases of the aggregate value of $3,342,928, giving employment to 1,574 operatives and 3,775 fishermen, and giving investment to more than $3,000,000 capital; and

Whereas it is evident from past experience elsewhere that the fish in said river will become extinct unless properly protected and artificially hatched; and

Whereas from the fact that said Columbia River is partly within the jurisdiction of the State of Oregon and partly within the jurisdiction of the State of Washington, and therefore not subject wholly to the legislative control of either State, it becomes of the utmost importance that whatever legislation is necessary looking to the protection and promotion of this great industry should be enacted by the Congress of the United States, provided jurisdiction over the subject exists in Congress: Therefore

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it is hereby, instructed to investigate and report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date whether or not the Congress of the United States has jurisdiction to legislate concerning the protection and promotion of the salmon fisheries of the Columbia River.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 12th instant approved and signed the act (S. 708) to amend section 4 of an act to provide for the adjustment of land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads and for the forfeiture of unearned lands, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had on the 13th instant approved and signed the act (S. 1046) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Kansas City, Pittsburg and Gulf Railroad Company to construct and operate a railroad, telegraph, and telephone line through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved February 27, 1893.

ALLEGED ASSESSMENTS IN THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER], coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire and report whether, during the year 1895 or any portion thereof, any of the employees of the Post-Office Department, while receiving pay from appropriations for that Department, did, with the knowledge, connivance, or direction of any clerk or clerks, or chief or chiefs of division, levy and collect assessments of money on and from other employees of the Department to be used, and which was used, for political purposes in States where election campaigns were in progress at that time; whether any person or persons were employed and borne on the Department rolls as employees and regularly paid as such who, while pretending to be discharging the duties of inspectors in the free-delivery service, were in fact actively engaged in aiding and assisting one of the political parties in said election campaign; whether, during such time, in room 3 of the Interior Department building, or in any other room or rooms in said building or in any other building, any employee of the Department was directing or managing the employment of persons for the purposes aforesaid and receiving and disbursing the moneys so assessed and collected, and whether such manager or director kept an account of such moneys in his own name in any bank of the city of Washington or elsewhere.

The committee will inquire and report, further, whether during the period covered by this resolution any person or persons were employed by any clerk or chief of division in the Post-Office Department and kept on the Department pay rolls and paid out of the Department funds, which payment was not authorized by law or by any lawful rule or regulation of the Department, and for which services no appropriation had been made by Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that that resolution be passed over without prejudice.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF BOND SALES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER], coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators, not more than two of whom shall belong to one political party, shall be appointed by the Vice-President, whose duty it shall be—

First. To investigate and report generally all material facts and circumstances connected with the sale of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury in the years 1894, 1895, and 1896.

Second. To investigate and report specially what amount of available funds, classified, was in the United States Treasury and on deposit in other places, subject to the order of the Secretary of the Treasury, at the time the bonds were sold or offered for sale; whether there was or was not coin enough on hand to meet all coin obligations of the Government due at the time said bonds were sold or when they were offered for sale; what obligations were due at that time and the amount of each, stated separately; what was the reason for any unusual withdrawal of coin from the Treasury shortly before bonds were sold or offered for sale, if such unusual withdrawals were in fact made, and by what persons or classes of persons and for what purpose or on what account such withdrawals were made; who purchased the bonds, in what amounts, and where, whether in the United States or in foreign countries, and in what proportions, and from what persons or classes of persons the gold was procured with which to pay for the bonds, what the bonds sold for, and what was the market price of our Government bonds at the time, and what effect the bond sales had on the credit and business of the people of the United States.

Third. To investigate and report as to the manner of disposing of said bonds, by what authority, and what contracts, advertisements, or proposals were made by the Secretary of the Treasury in relation thereto; what agreements or contracts, and whether oral or in writing, and whether publicly or privately and secretly, were entered into by the Secretary of the Treasury and any other person or persons with respect to the sale and purchase of the bonds; whether any officer of the Government, or any person or persons for such officer and on his behalf and in his personal interest, and with his knowledge or consent, entered into any contract, agreement, or arrangement, directly or indirectly, with any person or persons, partnership, corporation, company, or syndicate, for the purpose of affecting the price offered or to be offered for said bonds or any of them, with the intent and expectation to receive commission or personal reward by reason of such contract, agreement, or arrangement; whether such contract or agreement had any and what effect on the prices offered for the bonds, what the effect was, and who, if any person, profited by it and to what extent.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope that resolution will be passed over, so that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] may have the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. PEFFER. What is the objection?

Mr. CULLOM. I simply ask that the resolution may be passed over, as the Senator from Minnesota desires to address the Senate.

Mr. PEFFER. Without prejudice?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

CATTLE QUARANTINE IN SOUTHWESTERN STATES.

Mr. VEST. On the last day's session of the Senate a communication was received from the Secretary of Agriculture, in response to a resolution of the Senate, adopted at my instance on the 12th instant, in regard to the quarantine line recently established by the Secretary of Agriculture on the northern border of Texas and of other States. I ask the Senate to take it up for the purpose of reference. It is Senate Executive Document No. 121.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, in response to resolution of the Senate, dated February 12, 1896, copies of the regulations establishing the quarantine line in the Southwestern States for the years 1895 and 1896.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senate, and especially of Senators from the cattle-raising and cattle-feeding States, to the vast importance of this action of the Secretary of Agriculture. I will say in a very few words that the effect of this order of the Secretary of Agriculture is to increase the price of beef to the people of the United States, and its specific effect upon States like Missouri, Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, Nebraska, and Kansas is to deprive the cattle feeders of those States of their supply of beef from the southwestern portion of the Union for the coming year. We have now in those States the largest corn crop we have ever raised. Corn is worth from 10 to 12½ cents a bushel at cattle depots in Missouri and Kansas, and in other States it is worth even less. Our cattle supply is very deficient, because some years ago there was a panic in regard to the price of cattle, and cattle raisers sacrificed their entire herds, including cows and calves. They were rushed upon the market; the price went down abnormally, and the supply was exhausted. We in Missouri are now, and I take it to be the case in the other States I have mentioned, absolutely dependent upon the supply of cattle for feeding purposes from the great State of Texas. The supply from the other States, Colorado, Arkansas, the Indian Territory, and Arizona, is comparatively unimportant. If the Texas supply is shut off from the cattle feeders of the great corn States of the Northwest, it will result in a vast increase in the price of beef throughout the United States and in an absolute and specific loss to the cattle raisers of those States.

In 1884 Congress passed an act in regard to the prevention of contagion among cattle. It was the act which established what is known as a Bureau of Animal Industry in the Agricultural Department. Senators who were here in service at that time will remember the discussion which occurred here for days in regard to State rights and the power of the Federal authorities to go into a State for the purpose of destroying cattle supposed or charged to be infected with pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious cattle diseases. The result of that controversy and argument was that we passed the act of 1884, which gave to the Bureau of Animal Industry in the Agricultural Department, or rather to the Commissioner of Agriculture, as the Secretary was then termed, the power to prevent the carrying of diseased cattle from one State or Territory to another or to the District of Columbia.

That was the compromise effected between divers opinions in regard to the power of the Federal authorities. It was assumed then, in order to settle the question, that power should not be given to the Federal authorities to go inside of a State and take possession of infected cattle or cattle charged to be such for the purpose of quarantining or destroying them. The law remained in that condition until 1891, when, at the instance of General Rusk, then Secretary of Agriculture, the Special Committee on the Transportation and Sale of Meat Products, of which I was at that time chairman, introduced an amendment to the general appropriation bill of 1891 which was intended to give to the Secretary of Agriculture the power to quarantine counties and districts inside of States, the Secretary reporting that it was absolutely impossible for him to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia under the original act of 1884, which we had enacted. That change in the law has been continued from 1891 up to the last appropriation bill, and I ask the Secretary to read that law as it stands now, with a few immaterial amendments, so that this matter can be fully understood.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to use any part of this sum he may deem necessary or expedient, and in such manner as he may think best, in the collection of information concerning live stock, dairy, and other animal products, and to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia, tuberculosis, sheep scab, and other diseases of animals, and for this purpose to employ as many persons as he may deem necessary, including $1,000 additional temporary compensation to the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, and to expend any part of this sum in the purchase and destruction of diseased or exposed animals and the quarantine of the same whenever in his judgment it is essential to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia, tuberculosis, or other diseases of animals from one State into another, etc.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, the object of that legislation, as every member of the Committee on Transportation and Sale of Meat Products and of the Committee on Appropriations will testify, was to extend this power so that the Commissioner of Agriculture, now the Secretary of Agriculture, should have the right to quarantine counties inside of States in order to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia outside.

I ask the Secretary to read the reply of the Secretary of Agriculture to the resolution I offered, which shows that he denies that he has any power to establish quarantine inside of a State.

The Secretary read as follows:

In response to this resolution I send herewith copies of the regulations establishing the quarantine line in the Southwestern States for the years 1895 and 1896. From these regulations it is seen that the quarantine line for the year 1895 crossed the territory of the States of Texas and Arkansas and the Territory of Oklahoma, while the line as established for 1896 is made to conform with the boundary line of these States and this Territory.

The reason for the change is found in the act of May 29, 1884, which prohibits the shipment of live stock affected with any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease from one State or Territory to another, or from any State into the District of Columbia, or from the District into any State, and provides a penalty for the shipment of such live stock in violation of the law.

I do not find anything in the statute mentioned or any other statute which directs or authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to prevent the shipment or driving of infected live stock from one section of a State to any other section of that State, or to establish a quarantine line across the territory of a State with the purpose of preventing such movement of affected or exposed live stock, except by cooperation with the authorities of that State and in conformity with the laws thereof.

In past years quarantine lines have been made across the territory of several States which were not authorized by existing law, but which were made as a concession to the cattle industry, and in the expectation that the interests of the communities involved would be sufficient to secure respect for such lines. Unfortunately, these expectations have not been realized. Infected cattle have been driven with impunity across such lines, endangering the cattle industry of the United States, and particularly the export trade in live cattle.

Violations of the regulations of this Department were brought to the attention of the governor of Texas last summer, and it appears from his communications in reply that under the Texas statutes the quarantine line can not be enforced until after May 15 of each year. Such regulations should go into effect not later than February 15 in order to guard against the dissemination of Texas fever. If cattle can be shipped or driven from the infected section of Texas to the healthy section without restriction until May 15, the contagion is likely to be disseminated over the whole State, and this contagion will remain active until the following winter. It is therefore unsafe to allow any cattle from the State to be shipped into other States or Territories, except for immediate slaughter, and in accordance with the regulations provided by this Department.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I dislike exceedingly to be again put in the attitude of criticising the action of the Secretary of Agriculture. I do not question his motives. I sympathize entirely with his object in preventing the spread of pleuro-pneumonia, a deadly disease, and one which would destroy, if unrestrained, the entire cattle industry of the country. But it is most unfortunate that, after establishing this quarantine line across States, across Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee, and after three years' operation of that order, the Secretary all at once discovers that he has not the legal power and the constitutional right to retain that line, and is now engaged in an acrimonious discussion with the governor of Texas with regard to the line as established inside of that State. I care nothing about the details of this discussion between the governor of Texas and the Secretary of Agriculture; but the result upon the cattle raisers of Missouri and upon the other cattle-raising and cattle-feeding States is most disastrous. In a year when, as I have said, we have the largest possible supply of corn we are shut off from the cattle supply of Texas, and the result is that the price of beef meat goes up throughout the entire country, and in this era of depression there is additional financial depression caused by reason of this order.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to make a statement in regard to this matter, as it is rather important to my State?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. I wish to state, Mr. President, that this quarantine question in the northern part of my State is one that has excited a great deal of interest for the last four or five years. When Secretary Rusk was in charge of the Agricultural Department I went to him and urged him to extend the quarantine line south so as to include north of the line two tiers of counties in my own State. He promised to do so, but the election came on and he failed to do it. I then, in connection with my colleagues in the House of Representatives, Mr. MCCULLOCH, Mr. DINSMORE, and Mr. NEILL, urged upon the present Secretary of Agriculture the necessity of changing the lines so as to relieve from the operations of the quarantine regulations these two tiers of counties in Arkansas, because they operated as a great hardship upon the people in that section who own and raise cattle. In fact, the quarantine regulations resulted in taking from $2 to $3 off the price of every head of cattle that was shipped from northern Arkansas into St. Louis, although the character of country and the character of cattle were precisely the same as those in Missouri, the country being equally healthy and free from all cattle diseases.

Finally the Secretary consented to make, and did make, an order dated, I think, February, 1893, extending the line south so as to relieve the two tiers of counties in Arkansas from the regulations of the quarantine. It was a proper order to make. It gave universal satisfaction in twelve or fourteen counties in northern Arkansas. No possible hurt has ever come or could come from it. I was, therefore, greatly surprised on the 28th of January when I received a copy of a new order from the Secretary of Agriculture reestablishing the old line between Arkansas and Missouri, thereby placing those counties again under the quarantine regulations which entailed such a great hardship upon the people of northern Arkansas. In company with General NEILL and Mr. DINSMORE, of the House of Representatives, I went to the Department about ten days ago and we urged upon the Secretary again to be relieved from this hardship, when he made the same answer as he had made to the Senator from Missouri, that he had no power to establish quarantine regulations inside a State unless he could have the consent and cooperation of the State authorities. We were persistent, however, and told him that we had passed a statute in the State of Arkansas to prohibit the crossing of that line where the quarantine line was made in the State, which would be enforced. He finally agreed with us, as I understood him, that he would correspond with the governor of our State, and if he could be assured that the State law would be enforced he would modify this late regulation and reestablish the quarantine line so as to leave these two tiers of counties in northern Arkansas north of the line instead of south of it, as does the late order.

I wished to make this statement in order that the people of northern Arkansas might know the precise condition of affairs. I hope and believe that when the Secretary of Agriculture hears from the governor of our State he will reestablish the line, leaving those two tiers of counties in northern Arkansas north of the quarantine line and the cattle not subject to quarantine regulations, which operates with such great hardship upon the cattle raisers in the northern part of our State. I hope he will reestablish that line. If he fails to do so, it will undoubtedly work great injustice and great hardship upon those people living in the counties I have mentioned. The cattle there are as free from disease as the cattle in any section of the Union, and there is no reason why they should be subject to quarantine regulation, and I am confident the governor of the State will give the Secretary the assurance that he requires as to the enforcement of the State law.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, it will be noted in the reply of the Secretary of Agriculture to the resolution of the Senate that he distinctly affirms that he can find no law which authorizes him to establish a quarantine line inside of a State. I assume that the Secretary of Agriculture has seen the provisions in the appropriation bills from 1891 to 1895. He must have seen them, because his attention is called specifically to the appropriation act of 1894 in a letter from the district attorney, R. U. Culberson, I believe, of the western district of Texas. If the Secretary of Agriculture means to say that Congress had no right to make those provisions in those appropriation bills, I am very sorry he did not say so in so many words. He says in a letter to Mr. Hughes, the president of a cattle association in Texas, who wrote to him earnestly remonstrating against this last order, that he is powerless to go into a State and establish a quarantine line without the cooperation and consent of the authorities of that State; in other words, that if pleuro-pneumonia exists in a county or a district, unless the State authorities cooperate with the Federal authorities the Secretary of Agriculture is powerless to confine pleuro-pneumonia to that district or to that county. In these appropriation bills, as shown by what the Secretary has read, Congress intended to give, and did give, if the English language amounts to anything, the power to the Secretary of Agriculture to go into any State, buy up the diseased cattle, and destroy them or quarantine them in that State, as he might see proper; and in every one of these appropriation bills so much as is necessary out of the aggregate appropriation to the Bureau of Animal Industry is devoted to that purpose.

Now, under this ruling of the Secretary of Agriculture, I say, in conclusion, that from the 1st of February—because he says first that the 15th of February ought to be the beginning of the quarantine in each year, and he afterwards says that the safest date would be the 1st of February—from the 1st of February to the 15th of November in each year no cattle can be brought out of the State of Texas, or out of Arkansas, or any of the Southwestern States, for the purpose of being fed in the great corn States of the Northwest.

I move now that the communication of the Secretary of Agriculture be referred to the Committee on the Transportation and Sale of Meat Products.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. PALMER. I ask that the communication of the Secretary of Agriculture, instead of being referred, be laid upon the table for the present. I hope to be able to-morrow or the next day to address the Senate upon the general principle involved.

Mr. VEST. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the communication will lie upon the table.

DISTRICT AND CIRCUIT COURTS IN TENNESSEE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution reported by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] from the Committee on Foreign Relations, on which the Senator from Minnesota is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Minnesota kindly yields to me in order that I may ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider at this time House bill 1676, which changes the times of holding the terms of the Federal courts at Knoxville, in Tennessee. The first term of the court is to be held on the first Monday of next month. I therefore ask unanimous consent of the Senate for the consideration of the bill at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. CHANDLER. I shall not object if the bill does not lead to debate; but I do know that the Senator from Minnesota has been patiently waiting here for more than a half hour in the hope that he might be allowed to go on.

Mr. HARRIS. If the bill leads to the slightest debate, I shall not ask the Senate to consider it. I would not impose upon the Senator from Minnesota who is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. I shall not interpose now, but I give notice that I will object to any other business, even if the Senator from Minnesota yields.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1676) to change and fix the time for holding the district and circuit courts of the United States for the northern division of the eastern district of Tennessee.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to strike out section 3, as follows:

SEC. 3. That this act take effect from and after its passage, the public welfare requiring it; and that all laws and parts of laws conflicting with this act be, and are hereby, repealed.

Mr. HARRIS. That provision is wholly unnecessary, but it is absolutely harmless; and, in view of the shortness of the time between now and the time at which the first term of the court is to be held, I appeal to my friend from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] to let the Senate disagree to the amendment, so that the bill may be passed at once.

Mr. PLATT. This is a House bill, I believe?

Mr. HARRIS. It is a House bill.

Mr. PLATT. The committee reported an amendment striking out section 3, because the section was unnecessary, and, indeed, ridiculous; but if there is necessity for the immediate passage of the bill, we will withdraw the amendment and allow the bill to pass.

Mr. HARRIS. I should be glad to have that done. I quite agree with the Senator as to the unnecessary character of the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

R. 59) extending the provisions of section 79 of "An act providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents," approved January 12, 1895, so as to include monographs, bulletins, and reports of the Geological Survey published in 1894 and succeeding years.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the concurrent resolution submitted by me some time ago.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the concurrent resolution indicated by the Senator from Minnesota, which will be read.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution reported by Mr. DAVIS from the Committee on Foreign Relations January 20, 1896, as follows:

Concurrent resolution relative to the assertion and enforcement of the Monroe doctrine.

Whereas President Monroe, in his message to Congress of December 2, A. D. 1823, deemed it proper to assert as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved that the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained, were thenceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power; and

Whereas President Monroe further declared in that message that the United States would consider any attempt by the Allied Powers of Europe to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety; that with the existing colonies and dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and should not interfere, but that with the Governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have on great consideration and on just principles acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them or controlling in any other manner their destiny by any European power in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States; and further reiterated in that message that it is impossible that the Allied Powers should extend their political system to any portion of either continent without endangering our peace and happiness; and

Whereas the doctrine and policy so proclaimed by President Monroe have since been repeatedly asserted by the United States by Executive declaration and action upon occasions and exigencies similar to the particular occasion and exigency which caused them to be first announced, and have been ever since their promulgation, and now are, the rightful policy of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurrring), That the United States of America reaffirms and confirms the doctrine and principles promulgated by President Monroe in his message of December 2, A. D. 1823, and declares that it will assert and maintain that doctrine and those principles, and will regard any infringement thereof, and particularly any attempt by any European power to take or acquire any new or additional territory on the American continents, or any island adjacent thereto, or any right of sovereignty or dominion in the same in any case or instance as to which the United States shall deem such attempt to be dangerous to its peace or safety by or through force, purchase, cession, occupation, pledge, colonization, protectorate, or by control of the easement in any canal or any other means of transit across the American Isthmus, whether under unfounded pretension of right in cases of alleged boundary disputes or under any other unfounded pretensions, as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States and as an interposition which it would be impossible in any form for the United States to regard with indifference.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, it is a matter of common observation that each successive year our foreign relations increase in difficulty, complexity, and importance. This results, of course, from the development of the power of this nation, from the growing and overpowering tendencies of modern times to bring all nations closer together in social and commercial intercourse, and from all the reasons which prompt humanity, however divided by geographical lines and governmental differences, to affiliate. The closer the relations of one government to another, the more natural it is that their international relations should become of increasing frequency of recurrence and more difficult of solution. That fact explains why there are probably more questions unsolved between us and Great Britain than exist between us and all other nations of the world combined.

The present question is important and far reaching. It not only involves the adjustment of the controversy under consideration, but also the application and even the existence of the Monroe doctrine itself. Of course it must be most gratifying to everybody that the conditions of the controversy apparently have been considerably ameliorated within the last month. If that amelioration, when we are permitted to know its conditions, rests upon bases which do not concede anything from the Monroe doctrine, but recognizes and confirms it in its entirety, it will receive the warmest approval of the American people. But if, on the contrary, it is the result of any material abandonment of the principles enunciated by President Monroe, and to which the American people are most warmly attached, that people will rise up in condemnation of it.

I wish to speak, Mr. President, with the utmost temperateness of expression, for in all controversies of this character it is best to do so. It is in the interest of harmony and ultimate peace that nations, through all their exponents, representative or legislative, speak with honest frankness in defining their policies and what they expect to assert. In a way which will necessarily be discursive I shall consider briefly the origin of the Monroe doctrine, its character and nature, the various phases of our national existence in which it has been applied, and to some extent the present controversy.

I understand the Monroe doctrine as promulgated by President Monroe in 1823 to be fairly summarized as follows: That the American continents are not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power; that we should consider any attempt on the part of such powers to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety; that any interposition by European powers for the purpose of oppressing the independent nations of the American continents, or of controlling in any other manner their destiny, would be considered by the United States as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward us; that there shall be noninterference by the United States with European possessions on this hemisphere as they existed in 1823.

This doctrine, which has become indelibly inscribed upon our policy, was submitted by President Monroe, three months before he proclaimed it, to Madison and Jefferson, then in their declining years and in the retirement of private life. Mr. Madison approved it in characteristic terms of philosophic moderation, while Mr. Jefferson, the most prescient of American statesmen, the far-seeing man who acquired by the Louisiana purchase more territory to the United States than he had assisted to wrest from Great Britain by conquest, most warmly approved it and pronounced it to be the most important matter that had been submitted to his consideration since the Declaration of Independence.

It may not be improper for me to state briefly, for it has been done more fully and more ably here than I can possibly pretend to do, the origin of this doctrine and the connection of Great Britain with it. It is well known that immediately after Great Britain and the Allied Powers of Europe had compassed the overthrow of the First Napoleon a treaty, autographically signed by the sovereigns of Austria, Prussia, and Russia, and which was not signed by George, then regent of England, for the reason that the constitutional limitations of his authority required him to act through his ministers, committed the great powers of Europe to the forcible repression of any attempt by insurrection or revolt to change the existing Governments, which not only were asserted by the signatories to have been the legitimate result of their military triumphs, but which they also asserted were vested in them by Divine authority.

In various congresses held after the convention by which this alliance was formed these provisions were put forward with unmistakable distinctness. In the congress at Laybach it was promulgated that all reforms effected by insurrection should be held null and void. In that of Troppau it was asserted that Divine law gave the European nations the imprescriptible right to place themselves in open hostility to those States which, by change of their institutions and Governments, should afford a dangerous example to other peoples.

Under these sanctions Austria repressed with a cruel and bloody hand the popular uprisings in Naples and Piedmont. The Holy Alliance had restored the house of Bourbon, in the person of Ferdinand VII, to the throne of Spain. He found when he acceded to that Kingdom the constitution of the First Napoleon striking down abuses and opening a career for talents—the constitution of that man who, whatever he was, left every country better governed than it was when he seized it.

This constitution Ferdinand VII nullified and abrogated. A revolt took place in Spain about 1820 which had for its object the restoration of Napoleon's constitution. It was an uprising of popular right and conviction against the despotic acts of the monarchical authority so recently instituted in the peninsula by the Allied Powers. And accordingly, as the result or by the instigation of another congress held at Verona, France was commissioned to put in operation against the people of Spain the principles which had been declared by the Holy Alliance. She did so. Her armies traversed the peninsula and stood arrayed in triumph at its extremity at Cadiz. It was very natural under such circumstances that, flushed with such an achievement, the Allied Powers and France, in vindication of the principles which they had announced, should purpose to take upon themselves the attempt to restore to the Crown of Spain the South American colonies which, in the years immediately succeeding the accession of Joseph Bonaparte to the throne of that Kingdom, had shaken off the Spanish yoke and had become free and independent states.

The memoirs of Prince Metternich disclose that a congress, which was never held, was called to meet at Paris for that purpose. It was asserted that negotiations had been entered into between France and Spain for the purpose of enabling and justifying France in assisting Spain in the reconquest of her transatlantic dependencies. England was alarmed at this. The balance of power, to maintain which she had committed herself after the fall of Napoleon, had become overbalanced, or had threatened to become so, as to her. Accordingly Mr. Canning protested to the Court of France against the attempt which he supposed, and had reason to suppose, was to be made against the independence of the new nations in the Western Hemisphere. Aggrandizement by France on those continents at the expense and with the consent of Spain was feared. Accordingly England sent a formidable fleet into the West Indian waters. This inspired the fear or apprehension on the part of Mr. Rush, then our minister at the Court of St. James, that England had designs upon Cuba, while England had been inspired in her action by the fear that France had designs upon the same island. This was the beginning of the relation, or the understanding, between Great Britain and the United States.

Mr. Canning suggested that the United States notice this, and proposed that England and the United States should enter into a joint declaration of their status and intentions as to the new states on the Western Hemisphere. This was declined. This was the end of any joint action or understanding between Great Britain and the United States upon this subject. They proceeded separately thereafter upon their own lines. Great Britain notified the French Government that it would not permit the seizure or acquisition by France of any territory belonging to Spain upon the Western Continent, and Mr. Monroe, proceeding independently upon American lines, made the declaration the substance of which I have attempted to give.

These declarations were immediately self-efficient. The Holy Alliance and France abandoned their attempt and their intention. I have never thought that the action of Mr. Canning in that celebrated incident was inspired by any love on the part of that statesman for free institutions or for our Government. The thing involved and feared by him and by Great Britain was the danger to British trade. During the great continental wars Great Britain had become supreme upon the sea. No State of the continent had a mercantile fleet able to enter in the least degree into competition with her. She had engrossed the South American trade completely, and although failing and refusing to recognize the independence of those States, she had with a view to trade established consular relations wherever the performance of consular duty would aid her trade.

I say that I have never believed that any love for the spread or perpetuity of free institutions at all inspired the British Government in what it did in this matter, and although Mr. Canning grandiloquently boasted that "I sought the materials of compensation in another hemisphere, * * * I called the New World into existence to redeem the balance of the Old," he also stated while he was attempting to identify English and American action, in a letter to the British minister at Madrid, respecting the ephemeral monarchy of Iturbide in Mexico, and the recently established Empire of Brazil, that "monarchy in Mexico and monarchy in Brazil would cure the evils of universal democracy which I most dread—America versus Europe."

Mr. President, it is unfortunate, and yet not to be wondered at, that among a people of so many and various convictions as our own attempts should be made to qualify or to entirely deny the Monroe doctrine. The doctrine itself stands challenged. The letter of the Secretary of State and the message of the President have been assailed. The concurrent resolution now pending has been attacked upon the ground that it commits the Government of the United States to too much in this or in any future controversy of like character. The resolution, embodying, as it does, the text of the Monroe doctrine, particularizes that doctrine as to cases existing or imminent.

It does not commit the Government of the United States to any protectorate over the governments of Spanish or Portuguese America. We are not bound by that doctrine or by that resolution to any guardianship over them. We have under that doctrine and that resolution no responsibility whatever for their conduct as to foreign nations. Not one of the South American States can derive any exemption under that doctrine or that resolution from the chastisement of war by any foreign power, the only limitation being under the policy of this Republic that acquisition of territory by such war, as the result of superiority in arms or conquest, shall not follow as a result.

The principle requires the United States to intervene when, and only when, it considers that the act threatened or proposed by a foreign power is dangerous to our peace or safety. This peace or safety may be threatened by the hostile action of a foreign power alone, or it may be menaced by the amicable, collusive, and cooperative action of a European power with a South American State having for its object the results which are opposed to the peace and safety of the United States. In either case, as against either party or both combined, the United States should intervene and assert the policy now under consideration in any instance as to which it shall deem such attempts to be dangerous to its peace or safety.

The principle of this doctrine is neither novel nor unprecedented. The history of Europe ever since the peace of Westphalia is filled with its examples. Turkey is to-day a standing object lesson of its application, and has been for more than a century. Ever since the Crescent began to wane over Europe it has been the doctrine of the civilized powers of that continent that none of them by any means, whether by conquest or by arrangement with Turkey, shall acquire any portion of the territory of the Ottoman Empire. While it is true that the illustration afforded by Turkey and the powers of Europe in relation to her fails to be justified by any such principle as that upon which the Monroe doctrine is based, the illustration is one of particular cogency and perfect force.

When the Marquis of Salisbury stated in his reply to Mr. Olney that the assertion of the American policy is not based upon any canon of international law he did not state the entire fact. If from that statement it is to be inferred that the assertion of that policy is against the rules of international law, it is manifestly incorrect. While the right of intervention has not gone into the universal canon of international law as a right between nations, it is nevertheless a right existing in any nation, under the principles of that high system of jurisprudence by which it can authoritatively intervene upon the territory or in the affairs of any other State, whenever it deems that the situation is such as to endanger its peace and safety. And this application is nowhere so frequent and nowhere so frequently justified as in cases where the acquisition of territory by one power is deemed by another power to be dangerous to its peace and safety. No publicist states this more positively than Sir Robert Phillimore. In his chapter on intervention he says:

> The reason of the thing and the practice of nations appear to have sanctioned this intervention in the following cases. * * *
> More frequently and upon far surer grounds with respect to the territorial acquisitions or foreign relations, when such relations or acquisitions threaten the peace or safety of other States.

From the day when the Monroe doctrine was first promulgated it has been the Executive policy of this Government, and no leading American statesman that I am aware of, except Mr. Calhoun, ever denied the permanency of its application. Mr. Webster said immediately after the announcement:

> I look on the message of December, 1823, as forming a bright page in our history. I will neither help to erase it nor tear it up; nor shall it be by any act of mine blurred or blotted. It did honor to the sagacity of the Government, and I will not diminish that honor. It elevated the hopes and gratified the patriotism of the people. Over those hopes I will not bring a mildew; nor will I put that gratified patriotism to shame.

He also said, and I read this as bearing upon the true interpretation of the doctrine, that it is to be invoked when, and only when, the United States may consider its peace and safety to be involved:

It is doubtless true, as I took occasion to observe the other day, that the declaration must be considered on our rights and to spring mainly from a regard to their preservation.

It did not commit us at all events to take up arms at any indications of hostile feeling by the powers of Europe toward South America. * * * If an armament had been furnished by the allies to act against the provinces the most remote from us, as Chile or Buenos Ayres, the distance of the scene of action diminishing also our means of effectual interposition, might still have left us—to content ourselves with remonstrances.

To do what? Not to acquiesce, but he says—

But a very different case would have arisen if an army equipped and maintained by these powers had been landed on the shores of the Gulf of Mexico and commenced the war in our immediate neighborhood. Such an event might justly be regarded as dangerous to ourselves, and on that ground call for decided and immediate interference by us.

When these words were spoken our population was small; steam and electricity had not then begun the oceanic transference of thought and matter. The Nicaragua Canal was the chimera of a few enthusiastic visionaries; our possessions on the Pacific Coast were small and inconsiderable, and were protected by their isolation and remoteness. We had not thought of acquiring California.

Under existing conditions what would Mr. Webster now say? These conditions would have made applicable to those States mentioned by him his explicit declaration as to our duty in case hostilities should be commenced by a European power upon the shores of the Gulf of Mexico. But under conditions as they then were and now are Venezuela by her location, her relative situation to the United States, would have been a case in point for Mr. Webster to declare for the effective interposition of this Government even at that time.

The course of the executive department of the United States in the assertion of this doctrine has been consistent from the date of its promulgation. Nowhere does this appear more clearly than by the declarations of the various Administrations respecting the Island of Cuba. As I have stated in giving a sketch of the history of this matter, so far as Great Britain and the United States were concerned, apprehensions concerning the acquisition of Cuba by France or England were the very origin of this declaration by notifications made by Mr. Rush and Mr. Gallatin, as I shall show. Mr. Clay, Secretary of State, as directed by President Adams, wrote to Mr. King in 1825 directing our ministers to the various European courts to announce "that the United States for themselves desire no change in the political condition of Cuba; that they were satisfied that it should remain open, as it now is, to their commerce; and that they could not with indifference see it passing from Spain to any European power."

The Marquis of Salisbury observes in his letter that so far as he is aware the letter of Mr. Olney is the first written communication that this Government has ever addressed to any foreign state asserting the Monroe doctrine. In a certain exact and literal sense that may possibly be correct, although I do not think it is. The United States had asserted that doctrine for more than seventy years by the messages of Presidents and by instructions to our foreign ministers, and has inscribed its adhesion to it upon the pages of history so conspicuously and indelibly that it seems something like a subterfuge at this time to make the point that the United States has never in a written communication submitted its pretensions to any foreign power.

I think that this letter of Mr. Clay, by direction of President John Quincy Adams, in 1825, enjoining upon our ministers to notify the foreign powers what our views were respecting Cuba and its acquisition by any of them was a distinct assertion of the Monroe doctrine in its entirety.

Mr. Gallatin, in 1826, states in his memoirs that he "tried to impress strongly upon his (Mr. Canning's) mind that it was impossible that the United States could acquiesce in the conquest by or transference of that island (Cuba) to any great maritime power."

Mr. Webster wrote to Mr. Campbell, the minister at Madrid, in 1843:

The Spanish Government has long been in possession of the policy and wishes of this Government in regard to Cuba, and has repeatedly been told that the United States never would permit the acquisition of that island by British agents or forces upon any pretext whatever; and that in the event of any attempt to wrest it from her, she might securely rely upon the whole naval and military resources of this country to aid her in preserving or recovering it.

Mr. President, the case of Cuba was one where the above declarations were made upon the mere supposition that Spain might at some time wish to sell that island to a European power. No one then entertained the conception that if any European power possessing a colonial dependency or any South American State deemed it advantageous to cede it to another European power, such cession would not be a violation of the principles promulgated by President Monroe. Upon the mere apprehension that such a sale or cession was intended, Mr. Webster expressed the opinions which I have cited.

The Yucatan incident presents a very conspicuous definition and assertion of the principles enunciated by President Monroe. This was a case where a Central American State was engaged in a war with her Indian tribes. She was unable, it seems, to make head against them. She requested the interposition and solicited the interference and dominion of England and Spain for her protection. On that and other occasions President Polk announced and defined the Monroe doctrine as I understand it to be. This definition by Mr. Polk produced, if I recollect correctly, the remarkable and unaccountable statement by Mr. Calhoun that the Monroe doctrine was a merely ephemeral enunciation, dying with the occasion which produced it, and that it did not prevent any South American or Central American power from annihilating its sovereignty by cession. In this statement Mr. Calhoun stands alone among American statesmen.

Mr. President, take as an illustration an event comparatively recent. It is but a short time since we were debating in the Senate with great earnestness and some acrimony the conduct of the present Administration toward the then recently instituted Republic of Hawaii. There is an instance in which in regard to an island remote from our shores, in the heart of the Pacific Ocean, it has been proclaimed since 1840, repeatedly by various Secretaries of State, and I do not know but in the messages of various Presidents, that ultimate destiny has committed the Hawaiian Islands to coalescence with the United States, and that no foreign intervention or cession of that territory to any foreign power would be tolerated by us. As sustaining the propriety, the expediency, the necessity, of making a Congressional declaration of what are conceived by Congress to be the principles enunciated by President Monroe as applicable to existing conditions, I desire to read the resolution passed by this body, introduced by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], respecting Hawaii:

Resolved, That of right it belongs wholly to the people of the Hawaiian Islands to establish and maintain their own form of government and domestic policy; that the United States ought in no wise to interfere therewith, and that any intervention in the political affairs of these islands by any other government will be regarded as an act unfriendly to the United States.

When this resolution was passed, Hawaii was at peace with all the world. The newborn Republic had been recognized by all the nations of the earth. There was no government upon the planet making any attack upon her sovereignty except the United States itself, who was engaged in the attempt to reseat upon an overturned throne a sanguinary and barbarous queen. If it was proper for this body to pass a resolution of that character under such circumstances in regard to Hawaii, what objection can there be at the present time, under existing conditions, to Congress firmly, temperately, clearly, explicitly proclaiming by resolution its adherence to the Monroe doctrine and its application to such existing conditions?

Everyone is familiar with the present controversy. It has existed for fifty years. It arises from the undetermined interior boundaries between British Guiana and Venezuela—boundaries necessarily, perhaps, left somewhat obscure and indeterminate by the terms of the treaty which concluded the peace of Westphalia, and by the treaty of 1814, whereby Holland ceded to Great Britain a portion of her possessions in Guiana.

It is to be remarked that throughout this controversy Venezuela has always made one consistent claim. During all the time that this dispute has been carried on the claim of Venezuela has been consistent and unyielding that the River Essequibo is the boundary which separates her possessions from those of Great Britain.

As time has gone on in the course of this long-protracted altercation, the claims of Great Britain have increased immeasurably. A map showing the various boundaries prescribed by Great Britain is perfectly bewildering in its intricacies and inequities. She has never laid a single definite boundary line and said, "This, and no other, is the line upon which I stand." She has never anywhere along the whole course of this dispute set up the image of the god Terminus and said, "Here are my unalterable bounds." She has progressed beyond the Essequibo to the Schomburgk line. She has gone beyond that in steady advance almost to the Orinoco River on its western and southern course, until by a growth of pretensions with which history has made us familiar by its examples, she claims 70,000 and more square miles of territory, and says as to arbitration, "I will arbitrate as to my claim west of the Schomburgk line; I will not arbitrate any question as to territory east of that line."

The extreme claim of Great Britain in Venezuela is the entire river basin of the Essequibo, as indicated by the streams that run into that river from the west. It is an enormous expanse of territory. Yet the extension of the Schomburgk line to Point Barima is not vindicated even by that geographical pretension.

It is very interesting to consider how and where this claim originated. In all text-books of geography taught in schools, in all political manuals, in all encyclopedias and sources of information up to within a time comparatively recent, the boundaries between Venezuela and Great Britain were as plainly set down and known as any geographical fact which is not liable to be overturned by the aggressions of a strong power upon a weak one. I have here the book of Robert Schomburgk, sent to me by an esteemed constituent. It was published in London in 1840. It contains the original map to which such frequent reference has been made. Whether Robert Schomburgk at that time was in Venezuela as an agent of Great Britain for the purpose of setting up a boundary of any kind is not certain from the book.

It is to be presumed that he was. But it does very clearly appear from what he states on pages 2 and 3 of this volume how indeterminate the boundary between Venezuela and British Guiana was at that time, and upon what theory Great Britain maintains her present contention, whatever it is, as to the line west of the Essequibo River. He says:

> The boundary which separates the British settlements from Venezuela and Brazil has never been determined.
> * * * If we follow the limits which nature prescribes by its rivers and mountains and include all the regions which are drained by the streams which fall into the Essequibo within the British territory, and, adopting the River Corentyn as its eastern boundary, the counties Demerara, Essequibo and Berbice, which constitute British Guiana, consist of 76,000 square miles

It was there that the conception first appears that, by a contested rule sometimes, but not invariably, applied for the determination of boundaries, where a State has taken possession of a river or of the mouth of a river, Great Britain could claim the entire basin of the Essequibo, which subtracts 70,000 square miles from Venezuelan territory and increases British territory to three or four times more than what fifty years ago it was almost universally conceded to be.

But there is something more to this than the mere acquisition of territory. The seizure of Point Barima or its acquisition by Great Britain involves the control by that power of the navigable channel of the Orinoco River at its mouth. A consideration upon the map of the relative situation of that geographical point toward ourselves and our own interests will demonstrate in a moment the importance of that occupation to us.

The Orinoco is one of the most remarkable river systems in the world. It is navigable for the largest vessels of war for 400 miles from its mouth. From its source it runs to the north and thence turning runs to the east until it empties into the Atlantic. Its upper waters connect with the navigable waters of the Amazon, and everyone knows how vast are the relations of that stream and its tributaries to the interior of South America.

The mouth of the Orinoco River is the key to a great internal commerce, destined in the future to become more vast than the imagination even can attempt to foresee. The hand of Great Britain is upon that key. She has flanked and taken in reverse, in a military sense, the commercial advantages of one-third of the South American Continent. The mouth of the Orinoco is about six days' sail by a fast steamship from the city of New York. It is about three days' sail from the entrance to the Nicaragua Canal. Its possession by Great Britain, in connection with her West India Islands, makes the Caribbean Sea an English lake and the possessor dominates all those waters. With a naval station at its mouth it has a commanding position as to all contingencies of peace or war, which can be apprehended by this Government. This is not pleasant to contemplate. It concerns our peace and safety, and demands an assertion of the principles of the Monroe doctrine.

Considering the evidence as it is, it is impossible not to feel that this contention for territory, based upon the assertion that it is a mere dispute as to boundary, is not in good faith. We see the familiar processes of history repeated here. The thing that hath been it is that which shall be, and there is no new thing under the sun. A claim of right to an extended boundary, an overrunning of frontiers, and occupation by the subjects of a foreign power, suffered and encouraged to continue until the conditions have become inveterate, become a pretext that this is a just and valid acquisition of territory under the guise of a boundary dispute.

The occasion for this controversy was not sought and has not been brought on by the United States. She has pleaded vainly for arbitration and for a peaceful composition of this matter; but Great Britain, asserting that in no event will she arbitrate anything east of the Schomburgk line, insisting that she must protect and defend her colonies even beyond that line, has by actual seizure—for the extension of government and jurisdiction is seizure—laid hold of territory which Venezuela steadily, and with more than plausibility, asserts never was the property of the Dutch, and never was, consequently, the property of England, but was always the property of Spain, from whom Venezuela derives her title.

Of course it is very pleasant to hear from the other side of the water in Parliamentary debate (and I wish to treat those pleasing words with the utmost possible respect and consideration) that this controversy is not what it was a month ago, and that great concessions have been made and will be made to the United States. I trust that may be so. I should like to see the basis upon which these alleged concessions have been made, because if they are made upon the basis of a passage in the President's message, to which I shall call the attention of the Senate, I assert that the people of the United States will never vindicate the policy foreshadowed by that portion of that document.

I desire to consider for a moment the diplomatic correspondence as it stands before this body and before the people. The Marquis of Salisbury in his letter to Mr. Olney denied not only the application of the Monroe doctrine to the question of boundary, but denied that it had any efficient existence in any controversy that can arise between any foreign power and the South American State. I send to the desk and ask that the Secretary will read the printed portion of that memorandum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

> The contentions set forth by Mr. Olney in this part of his dispatch are represented by him as being an application of the political maxims which are well known in American discussion under the name of the Monroe doctrine. As far as I am aware, this doctrine has never been before advanced on behalf of the United States in any written communication addressed to the Government of another nation; but it has been generally adopted and assumed as true by many eminent writers and politicians in the United States. It is said to have largely influenced the Government of that country in the conduct of its foreign affairs, though Mr. Clayton, who was Secretary of State under President Taylor, expressly stated that that Administration had in no way adopted it. But during the period that has elapsed since the message of President Monroe was delivered in 1823 the doctrine has undergone a very notable development, and the aspect which it now presents in the hands of Mr. Olney differs widely from its character when it first issued from the pen of its author.
> The dangers which were apprehended by President Monroe have no relation to the state of things in which we live at the present day. There is no danger of any Holy Alliance imposing its system upon any portion of the American continent, and there is no danger of any European State treating any part of the American continent as a fit object for European colonization. It is intelligible that Mr. Olney should invoke, in defense of the views on which he is now insisting an authority which enjoys so high a popularity with his own fellow-countrymen. But the circumstances with which President Monroe was dealing, and those to which the present American Government is addressing itself, have very few features in common.
> Great Britain is imposing no "system" upon Venezuela, and is not concerning herself in any way with the nature of the political institutions under which the Venezuelans may prefer to live. But the British Empire and the Republic of Venezuela are neighbors, and they have differed for some time past, and continue to differ, as to the line by which their dominions are separated. It is a controversy with which the United States have no apparent practical concern. It is difficult, indeed, to see how it can materially affect any State or community outside those primarily interested, except, perhaps, other parts of Her Majesty's dominions, such as Trinidad.
> The disputed frontier of Venezuela has nothing to do with any of the questions dealt with by President Monroe. It is not a question of the colonization by a European power of any portion of America. It is not a question of the imposition upon the communities of South America of any system of government devised in Europe. It is simply the determination of the frontier of a British possession which belonged to the throne of England long before the Republic of Venezuela came into existence.
> The Government of the United States is not entitled to affirm as a universal proposition, with reference to a number of independent States for whose conduct it assumes no responsibility, that its interests are necessarily concerned in whatever may befall those States simply because they are situated in the Western Hemisphere. It may well be that the interests of the United States are affected by something that happens to Chile or to Peru, and that that circumstance may give them the right of interference; but such a contingency may equally happen in the case of China or Japan, and the right of interference is not more extensive or more assured in the one case than in the other.

> They fully concur with the view which President Monroe apparently entertained, that any disturbance of the existing territorial distribution in that hemisphere by any fresh acquisitions on the part of any European State would be a highly inexpedient change. But they are not prepared to admit that the recognition of that expediency is clothed with the sanction which belongs to a doctrine of international law. They are not prepared to admit that the interests of the United States are necessarily concerned in every frontier dispute which may arise between any two of the States who possess dominion in the Western Hemisphere; and still less can they accept the doctrine that the United States are entitled to claim that the process of arbitration shall be applied to any demand for the surrender of territory which one of those States may make against another.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, while those statements repeat frequently the denial that this Government has no right to interfere in a boundary dispute, yet the opening portion of the statement which has been read, the concluding portion, and much of the remainder of this paper, which I regret that I have not time to analyze, but to which I call the careful scrutiny of the Senate, is a total denial of the existing efficacy or efficiency of the Monroe doctrine as applicable to any dispute which may arise between a foreign power and a South American State.

Recurring to Lord Salisbury's denial that this is the first written intimation by this Government of an intention to assert the Monroe doctrine, I find on the 26th of September, 1863, Mr. Seward addressed the Government of France as follows:

> Nor do the United States deny that in their opinion their own safety and the cheerful destiny to which they aspire are intimately dependent on the continuance of free republican institutions throughout America. They have submitted these opinions to the Emperor of France on proper occasions as worthy of his serious consideration in determining how he would conduct and close what might prove a successful war in Mexico. Nor is it necessary to practice reserve upon the point that if France should upon due consideration determine to adopt a policy in Mexico adverse to the American opinion and sentiments which I have described, that policy would probably scatter seeds which would be fruitful of jealousies which might ultimately ripen into collision between France and the United States and other American Republics.

Mr. President, in any review of the present situation, or of the discussions which have accompanied it, it becomes necessary to consider the message of the President of the United States upon this question. In doing this I wish to proceed with the utmost possible respect for any document emanating from that high authority which primarily affects our foreign relations. It is of the utmost possible concern to us, so far as our relations with foreign powers are concerned, that, irrespective of party, we shall, so far as possible, all stand together.

To a large portion of the President's message in assertion of the Monroe doctrine no possible exception can be taken. It has not been frequent in recent times that the people have so unanimously approved what they supposed to be an unqualified assertion of national dignity and honor. But a noncritical scrutiny of the message discloses that it contains an exception and reservation which diminish and limit the force and application of the Monroe doctrine to an important extent which has never before been attempted by any American statesman excepting Mr. Calhoun. The President of the United States says:

> Great Britain's present proposition has never thus far been regarded as admissible by Venezuela, though any adjustment of the boundary which that country may deem for her advantage and may enter into of her own free will can not of course be objected to by the United States.

I undertake to say that the American people will never vindicate that statement. It is no part of the Monroe doctrine, and it never was, that any adjustment which a South American State might make of its own free will as to a cession of territory, under any pretext whatever, could "not of course be objected to by the United States." Mr. Calhoun is the only statesman in our history who ever asserted that the doctrine could not prevent a voluntary cession of her sovereignty by a South American State.

Mr. President, if the nullification of the Monroe doctrine contained in these four lines is suffered to stand as part of the policy of the United States, it is impossible to see, upon any fair construction of this message, why, under any circumstances, any cession of territory or sovereignty by a Central or South American State can not be made without any right of question by this Government. In the case under present consideration, considering the relations of Venezuela to Great Britain, how significant this concession and these words are, that "any adjustment of the boundary which that country (Venezuela) may deem for her advantage and may enter into of her own free will can not, of course, be objected to by the United States."

Wherein is the free will of Venezuela operative, looking at the matter sensibly and squarely as it is, when she is at this moment under the duress of an ultimatum by England for acts committed by Venezuela on this very territory, and is under a limitation of time for reparation by her, or for reprisals by Great Britain in case of refusal?

If all this consoling talk from across the water, this temperate language from our adversaries, is based upon negotiations now pending upon the assumption that Venezuela can, of her own free will, by any act which she considers to her advantage, cede territory, and that to such a cession the United States, of course, can make no objection, if the pretext that those negotiations are a boundary dispute, is a mere pretext under which the acquisition of territory is sought, and the real fact is that there is to be an acquisition of territory beyond the limits of the true boundary by means of a treaty between Great Britain and Venezuela, the people of the United States never will acquiesce in it. It is practically a conquest.

Great Britain has extended her jurisdiction, has applied force to a large portion of territory claimed by Venezuela. She has said, "I will arbitrate west of a certain line; I will not arbitrate east of it; as to that I will admit no question." If Venezuela can make a cession under such circumstances, such duress, such surroundings, why not, under the principles of the few lines I have just read, can she not cede as the result of conquest and of foreign war, and wherein could we object?

Mr. President, we have enormous interests in the stability of the South American Republics. We form with them a vast unity of interests, the like of which has never existed between any independent systems of government since the world began. It is the unity of free Governments; it is the natural unity of trade and commerce. We called a great congress of these nations in Washington a few years ago to effect more intimate relations—political, social, and commercial. Those purposes, that unity, have been attacked by the pretensions of Great Britain in the present instance.

Unqualified disparagement of the Spanish-American people or their Governments is not justified by their character or their history. To condemn them because they have not entirely surmounted their inherited difficulties is unjust in the extreme. The weaker they are the greater is the danger to our peace and safety by foreign aggression.

The struggle to throw off the yoke of Spain began in 1810. Brazil dissevered herself from Portugal in 1823. There was thenceforth not a vestige left of foreign monarchy from Canada to Cape Horn. Those colonies became free and independent States, and thus they have ever since remained, except during that brief period of our own disability to enforce our foreign policy against European intervention, when an Austrian archduke was seated by the armies of France upon the throne of Mexico as the consequence of a treaty between Great Britain, France, and Spain, which was concluded upon the hope, expectation, and desire that the United States was about to vanish among the ghosts of dead empires and republics.

When the United States rose from its struggle, as strong in recreated might and unity as it had seemed weak in its agony, an assertion of the Monroe doctrine drove the French from their conquest and destroyed the Empire which they had instituted.

The establishment of independent States in Spanish and Portuguese America is one of the most momentous events of history.

The achievements of our fathers were unprecedented. They have never been surpassed. But they did not emancipate a continent. When their work was done the United States was bounded on its landward side by the possessions of Great Britain and Spain. But our ancestors taught all the people of the south how to achieve their independence. They did achieve it over a continental area so vast that from—

> Where Andes, giant of the western star,
> His meteor standard to the winds unfurl'd,
> Looks from his throne of clouds o'er half the world—

we saw the crown in the dust, the scepter broken, the miter humbled, and millions of men, triumphant over the wreck of despotism, rejoicing in the temple of free institutions which they had built upon its ruins.

They began their career of self-government. But they were impeded by enormous obstables. The founders of the United States had lived under a constitutional monarchy. They had enjoyed liberty of speech, printing, and conscience. They had largely governed themselves, and were familiar with the blessings of that stability which has always been the result of self-government when administered by men whose inheritance has been constitutional liberty. Our progress was immediate, unbroken, and marvelous.

But the Spanish colonies had been crushed under the most repressive and tyrannical autocracy that the world has ever seen. They had been governed from Europe by the comprehensive absolutism of Charles and by the minute and inquisitorial absolutism of Philip, whose successors had adopted their methods. There was no self-government. Corrupt and cruel viceroys had oppressed the estates, liberties, bodies, and souls of that people for three centuries. It is not surprising that when they emerged from that darkness of generations they did not and could not see and act with the efficiency of men who had lived in the light of an ancestral freedom. But though their advances have been slow, they have taken no step backward. For seventy years their progress has been from good to better. We can clearly see that during the last twenty years especially their governments have become more solid, their people more stable. Mexico now stands so firmly upon her great foundations that her stability is not thought of as a question.

Chile has become a powerful, prosperous, and enduring State through and in spite of her revolutions. She has possessed herself of the instrumentalities of the highest civilization. She has mastered the arts of peace, and she has also a fighting capacity equal to that of any people of the same numbers. The Argentine Republic is powerful, enlightened, and progressive. Brazil is perfectly composed, after having presented to the world the unexampled spectacle of the transformation of a monarchy into a republic by the people taking an emperor from the very citadel of his power, putting him on shipboard, and sending the imperial passenger away, an exile from a bloodless revolution.

To the science of international law South America has given Bello, Alcorte, Pando, and Calvo. Lessons in naval warfare have been taught by the conflicts of her armored vessels. In her own wars the valor of her people has been illustrious on a hundred battlefields. Everywhere the church has been divorced from the state. Conscience acts with freedom. Speech and the press are free. Education has been secularized and made universal.

Does anyone suppose—can anyone suppose, considering the universal rapine of territory in every other quarter of the globe during the last fifty years—that all this could have been brought to pass and that these struggling yet progressive nationalities would have been left unmolested had it not been an assured fact that the United States was always ready to maintain and assert the principles to which the message of James Monroe committed it in 1823? By all this the cause of free governments has been strengthened everywhere.

That cause is our cause. It is the cause of constitutional self-government all over the world. It is the cause of that hierarchy of free states upon this hemisphere destined, in the long processes of time and in the competition of nations and their policies, to bring to the aid of human progress and personal liberty all those omnipotent forces with which that Providence who presides over nations arms free men.

It will become the cause of England herself—the most powerful of self-governing States. For that time is inevitable in the struggle for human rights when antiquam exquirite matrem will be a mandate to us more imperious than that of the oracle, and when the mighty mother will stand arrayed with her mightier son until of both it will be said:

Hic domus Æneæ cunctis dominabitur oris,
Et nati natorum, et qui nascentur ab illis.

It is one of the most striking features of this controversy, Mr. President, that the arbitration of this entire question by Great Britain has been steadily denied and refused. Arbitration was requested by this Government through the enactment of joint resolutions by Congress. It was requested by Spain. It has been requested by several of the Spanish-American States in a manner equally formal; and the latest advice we have upon this subject is that there may be arbitration with negotiation. But as to what shall be settled by arbitration and what by negotiation there is no disclosure.

If there can be arbitration of the entire question, of course humanity will rejoice; but if it is to be that illusory and partial arbitration which the English Government has hitherto expressed its willingness to allow, namely, the giving up without question of everything east of the Schomburgk line, and arbitrating those shadowy advancing and receding claims west of that line, it does not touch at all the substance of this controversy, and may most seriously imperil our rights, our peace, and our safety.

Why should not such a controversy be arbitrated? Does anyone suppose that Great Britain would not arbitrate such a case between her and a power anywhere nearly her equal? Disputed boundary cases are the natural and proper subjects for arbitration. Costa Rica and Nicaragua arbitrated their case before President Cleveland during his first term. Great Britain arbitrated the last northwestern boundary dispute with us before the Emperor of Germany. The universal tendency of the most enlightened thought and the most advanced jurists, of the most experienced administrators of governments, is to refer these questions to some tribunal that can pass upon the law, the right, and the facts, and make the decision final. It is to be sincerely hoped that the intimations we have seen in the newspapers that this result may be brought about will not be without foundation.

Mr. President, the Monroe doctrine has never been looked upon with favor by any European power. The treaty of London in 1861 and the invasion of Mexico by England, France, and Spain were intentional contraventions of it, although a different pretext was expressed upon the face of the treaty. You may search the annals of our diplomatic intercourse from the time that doctrine was promulgated, and you will not find it assented to by any foreign power outside of the Western Hemisphere. One of the arguments most frequently advanced against its validity is that this declaration of principles enunciated by President Monroe was for a special occasion in 1823, and that it was a temporary and ephemeral measure which died with the occasion which produced it; that it never has had since the cessation of the causes which generated it any living efficacy or force whatever. This argument is especially reenforced by the statement that although Executives have, from time to time, enunciated and asserted the doctrine, yet so little has it been thought of by the American people, and so clearly has it not entered, as they say, into their policy, that there has been no legislative declaration of its validity and force since it was promulgated by President Monroe.

That statement, Mr. President, is true. There has been no legislative declaration by both Houses of Congress that the Monroe doctrine is or is not a cardinal policy of the United States. Foreign jurists have expatiated upon this; foreign newspapers have repeated it whenever any controversy concerning it has arisen. They have been echoed to some extent in this country. It has been taught from professors' chairs, too frequently, I am sorry to say, that because Congress had never put into the shape of resolution or legislative enactment the Monroe doctrine it was a mere declaration of the policy of the Administration which went into history seventy years ago.

I could cite the foreign jurists, reviewers, and pamphleteers to that effect to an extent which would weary the Senate. But I will give extracts from two. Calvo, a contribution of South America to international law, the Grotius of the nineteenth century, speaking of the Monroe doctrine, says:

The principles thus promulgated by President Monroe have never received any express sanction. If the United States have often been inspired by them in this or that act of their foreign policy, they have never made them legally obligatory by a formal legislative vote. This fact has always forbidden the attribution of the character of a law to the maxims of Monroe, and has caused them to preserve the simple title of a "doctrine."

That is the opinion of the most authoritative teacher of international law in continental Europe to-day. Sir Robert Phillimore, in his work upon International Law, in discussing the Monroe doctrine, says:

I may observe in passing that the doctrine contained in it, whatever that be—has not been corroborated by an act of the Legislature of the United States.

Throughout the discussion of the foreign text writers upon international law the denial is persistent of its binding efficacy as a matter of continuous policy of the United States upon the ground that it was the mere declaration of an Administration for a special and transitory purpose, a declaration which served that purpose and became nonefficient from that moment.

The pending resolutions do not add a single principle to the Monroe doctrine, nor do they take a single principle from it. They make it applicable by particularization to existing or imminent exigencies. They subtract nothing from its revered principles, as I think has been subtracted by the message of the President. The preamble is expressed in the words of President Monroe himself, with the exception of the recital that the doctrine and policy promulgated by him have been repeatedly enunciated by subsequent executive action of this Government. I will take the time of the Senate for a few moments to explain why the phraseology of the resolution as it is was adopted by the Committee on Foreign Relations. It has been said, as I have stated, by foreign authors, foreign statesmen, foreign publicists, that the Monroe doctrine died with the occasion of its birth, and therefore the resolution reaffirms and confirms it as an everexisting and continuing principle from the day of its origin. It is stated that this Government—

Will regard any infringement thereof, and particularly any attempt by any European power to take or acquire any new or additional territory on the American Continent or any island adjacent thereto—

The phrase in regard to islands was put in to make more certain what we deemed a fair construction of the expression of President Monroe, who in his message spoke only of the continents of the Western Hemisphere. And yet, in the light of the diplomatic papers of Mr. Webster and Mr. Clay, which I have read, who will deny that it is a proper construction of the message of President Monroe to include the West India Islands, and Cuba especially, as falling within its provisions?

There is a class of enthusiastic patriots in this country whose conceptions of the Monroe doctrine have been such that they deem it the duty of this Government to interfere in case any foreign power shall wage war upon any of the Central or Southern American Republics. To those who consider more carefully such an idea is extremely crude, dangerous, and far-fetched, but it is one which has been exceedingly prevalent and has done more harm to the efficient assertion of the doctrine itself than all other causes combined.

Accordingly the committee deemed it best to express in the resolution nearly in the language of Mr. Webster himself, and certainly in the spirit of that language, that such a construction of the Monroe doctrine ought no longer to be entertained, but that reserving to itself the right to judge, the United States would act "in any case or instance as to which United States shall deem such attempt to be dangerous to its peace or safety."

There is nothing radical, there is nothing aggressive, there is nothing warlike in the resolution. It is pacific in its intentions and its expressions, and it takes away the opprobrium which hostile writers have attempted to put upon the doctrine by their unfounded and reiterated assertions that we were establishing a protectorate over the entire South American Continent; that we were their guardians, and yet nevertheless we were not responsible for them; that our position was an absurdity and unwarranted by any proper relations that should exist between nations.

The resolution proceeds:

In any case or instance as to which the United States shall deem such attempt to be dangerous to its peace or safety, by or through force—

Nobody can object to that—purchase, cession, occupation.

Those words were designed to cover just precisely the contingencies I have described in my remarks, namely: That no South American State can of her own free will by treaty with a foreign powes cede away her territory or sovereignty under the pretext of force, purchase, or cession in any case where such a transaction shall be deemed by the United States dangerously to involve its peace and safety.

The word "pledge" is used in the resolution, and with reason. "Pledge" in international law means the hypothecation of territory to secure the payment of a debt or the performance of some act. It was stated some six weeks ago, apparently upon authority, that a treaty had been or was about to be negotiated between Great Britain and Spain, involving a loan to Spain by subjects of Great Britain, whereby certain ports of Cuba were to be pledged as security for the payment of the loan. Such a step would be the first act of acquisition. Such a step would be setting up the government of a foreign power to a certain extent in the Island of Cuba. Such an act would be the controlling of the destinies of that island by a foreign power. All history teaches us with monitions that we can not disregard that to put the ports of Cuba in pledge to any foreign power such as England would be the beginning, and perhaps the designed beginning, of the utter extinction of the sovereignty of Spain and its transfer to another power.

The word "colonization" is used, and why? Everybody supposed until recently that the prohibition by President Monroe as to colonization had done its work long since, and that by the passing of the American continents under the uncontradicted dominion of civilized powers the question of colonization was no longer open. But upon looking into the correspondence between Venezuela and Great Britain on this subject it is seen that in addition to the rights which Great Britain claims under her treaty with the Dutch, she claims, and made the claim to Venezuela, of certain treaties and cession by Indian tribes. The whole and original basis of colonization upon these continents was then, in the light of the nineteenth century, asserted by Great Britain in a diplomatic correspondence as the foundation of a teritorial claim. More than that, Mr. President, notwithstanding this vast area of territory, 70,000 square miles, is in controversy, Great Britain, begging the entire question, begging the merits of the entire contention, says "some 40,000 British subjects have gone into this disputed territory, and therefore I must protect them." If 40,000 or any number, less or more, of British subjects have gone into this territory, that gives Great Britain no right to protect them there as her subjects by virtue of her asserted sovereignty over that territory. They took their chances whether they went under the sovereignty of Venezuela or under the sovereignty of Great Britain. The declaration of the resolution respecting the control of the Nicaragua Canal no one can object to.

What I have already said will construe the language of the resolution in regard to alleged boundary disputes and the cession of territory thereunder being a violation of the Monroe doctrine. My proposition is, and I believe it is the true American policy, that under no pretext, and by no means, whether of boundary dispute, or by war, or cession, or pledge, or colonization, or occupation, or any other unfounded pretext, shall any European power acquire any territory upon either of these continents, or impose upon the governments thereof its system, or control its destinies, in any case where the United States shall deem such an attempt to be dangerous to its peace or safety. That policy, so defined, applies just as much and just as thoroughly to a boundary dispute, or the pretext of a boundary dispute, as it does to any other device by which territory is sought to be acquired in violation of the Monroe doctrine.

Mr. President, wherever we look over the civilized and uncivilized world we see territorial aggrandizement going on everywhere except on the Western Continent. The islands south of the equator in the Pacific have been taken up by France, Germany, and England—Russia seeking to get an outlet to the south from her icebound railway terminus at Vladivostock—and heaven grant she may get it; Japan, seizing the island of Formosa, is barred from her conquests on the Chinese mainland. France has overrun Cochin China and Cambodia. Siam, without a particle of warrant, except in the law of conquest, is subjugating the Kingdom of Madagascar.

The territorial acquisitions of England throughout the world we all know. She dominates Egypt, and an English administrator presides over the administration of Egyptian finances. Italy is making her way into Abyssinia, and all of Africa, all of the desert heart of slaveland south of the equator, has been partitioned between the great European powers. The little Republic which has changed its place of existence repeatedly under pressure of English aggression has been attacked by processes which, though disavowed, are perfectly intelligible when the history of the last fifty years is read.

As to the South American States, this, I believe, is the first instance in seventy years that any foreign government has attempted, under any pretense whatever, to acquire any territory or set up any dominion in that continent. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] suggests to me the case of the State of Honduras. I was limiting my remarks to South America, but I have always thought the case of Honduras a most striking violation of the Monroe doctrine—not only of that doctrine, but of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Developing as a territorial claim from the merely permissive right, which we call in the Northwest a logging permit, granted for the benefit of a few mahogany wood choppers, and which in terms recognized the sovereignty of Spain, it has extended into a claim of 7,500 square miles, dominating the Nicaragua Canal and our possessions on the Mexican coast. It is particularly to be observed that the latest official publications state that its western boundaries, like those of Venezuela, are as yet undetermined.

It is said that conditions have changed; that the Monroe doctrine is no longer applicable. I understand the Marquis of Salisbury to say that in his dispatch, and those who echo him in this country say the same thing—that it is better all around to permit the universal ascendancy of England to be established over the South American Republics whenever and wherever that power desires. When did the conditions change? When did the change begin?

Do not these conditions operate on Cuba to-day? What American would see, and could see, with a proper regard for the peace, the dignity, and the safety of his own country, the transfer of that island from Spain to Great Britain upon any terms or under any circumstances? Were not these conditions justly operative as to Mexico in 1861, or Yucatan in 1848, or Hawaii in 1894? No, Mr. President, the conditions and circumstances and dangers which produced the promulgation of the Monroe doctrine in 1823 are emphasized and made stronger as every year goes by.

Mr. President, there has been talk of war. To merely declare and define American policies and American rights has been deprecated as tending to bring on war. There never has been the least danger of war throughout this controversy. Neither Government has ever threatened it or purposed it. The interests of Great Britain and the United States in the great and common cause of civilization are too enormous and too vital to each of them to bring about such a consummation.

No American soldier will stand upon the soil of Canada; no American militia force will burn a Canadian village, and under the pretext of retaliation no British army will again apply the torch to the Capitol, to the Executive Mansion, or to the archives of the United States. New York will not be laid under contribution, nor will Melbourne, Hongkong, Auckland, or Bombay. The Canadian Pacific Railway will continue to transport its passengers and freights; the Welland Canal will not be seized, nor will the lock at Sault Ste. Marie. The English merchant marine will sail the monopolized seas in peace, and the people of the United States will continue to pay annually $150,000,000 in gold to English shipowners and underwriters for freights and premiums. These nations will adjust their differences amicably and with justice to each. I shall extremely regret if I have said any word to inflame the feelings on either side.

But the question now is whether Congress, to whom in the very vestibule of the Constitution all legislative power is given, which has the power to declare war and the authority to preserve peace by its power to provide for the raising of armies and navies, representing directly the will and sentiments of the people, will or ought, in the exercise of these powers thus confided to and duties imposed upon it, declare that the Monroe doctrine is a vital, indispensable, and continuous policy of the United States?

Why should we not do it? I am not aware that any principle which these resolutions assert has been seriously controverted on this side of the Atlantic, except by those who deny that the Monroe doctrine has now any efficient existence. Executives have declared this policy; party platforms have declared it, and yet, from the time that it was first promulgated, Congress never has done so. There never was a time more propitious, more exacting than the present time for such a declaration. In time of danger it is necessary, and it is the surest path to peace and good feeling to state firmly our position. Under the ameliorated conditions which this controversy seems to bear, it becomes more and more expedient and necessary for us to declare exactly our convictions and the policy of the American people upon this subject.

And, Mr. President, such a declaration is worthy of the dignity of this people. Abject to the degradation of subjection is any nation that takes counsel of its fears and dares not declare its principles. Such cowardice makes the cause of constitutional liberty a tolerated alien in its own heritage. [Applause.]

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. 995) granting a pension to Kate A. Pitman; and

A bill (H. R. 2800) granting a pension to Martha Brooks.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. 6) constituting Syracuse, N. Y., a port of delivery;

A bill (H. R. 3962) to authorize the construction of a bridge across Lake St. Francis, in the State of Arkansas; and

A bill (H. R. 4779) relating to the anchorage and movement of vessels in St. Marys River.

FORT SMITH AND WESTERN COAL RAILROAD.

The bill (H. R. 4153) to grant the Fort Smith and Western Coal Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the bill may lie upon the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

JOHN C. CUTTER.

The bill (H. R. 83) for the relief of John C. Cutter, late first lieutenant Thirty-sixth Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, was read twice by its title.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be taken up and considered at this time.

Mr. TELLER rose.

Mr. LODGE. It will not delay the Senate a moment. If necessary I can explain it in a few words.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear some explanation of the bill. It properly belongs to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator will observe that the bill gives the soldier nothing except what he gets under the original discharge.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; it revokes an order dismissing him from service and sets a precedent for thousands of other cases.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I will explain the bill. Lieutenant Cutter was in the Thirty-sixth Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry. He was regimental quartermaster under Colonel DRAPER, who introduced this bill in the other House. In retreat, November, 1863, from Lenoir, east Tennessee, he burned the officers' baggage and some other effects. His affidavit states that this was for want of wagons and by order of General Ferrero, to prevent its falling into the enemy's hands. The colonel reported that it was from neglect to give personal attention to the transportation, preferred charges of neglect of duty, and withdrew them on receiving his resignation. Colonel DRAPER, who was the colonel in command and made the charge, says:

I found it would not go through by a mere ordinary indorsement and I indorsed it "for the good of the service," and he was then discharged.

As there was nothing in Lieutenant Cutter's record of a dishonorable character, he having been a good soldier and having failed only in this matter of carelessness, I think it no more than fair that this stigma should be removed from his name.

The committee of the House concurred in this view, and say that even if Lieutenant Cutter was careless, which he denies, they concur in the view. He could not, and did not, anticipate that his resignation would have been accepted dishonorably. The bill was introduced by his colonel, who made the indorsement which led to his being discharged dishonorably, when the colonel meant nothing of the sort and was ready to accept the resignation. The House committee unanimously reported the bill. The House permitted the bill to go through without any objection. It carries with it no appropriation of any character.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the last part of the bill be read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed so as to allow the said Cutter any pay, bounty, or other allowances to which he would not have been entitled under the terms of his original discharge.

Mr. COCKRELL. That does not change the status. That places the beneficiary in just the same position as if he had been honorably discharged, does it not?

Mr. LODGE. It does not allow him to take anything that he can not take now under the existing discharge. It simply wipes from his record a stigma which he desires to have removed, which he thinks is unjust, which his colonel thinks is unjust, and which everybody is willing to have removed. It carries nothing with it.

Mr. VILAS. It is very obvious that the bill ought to go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection to the present consideration of the bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TELLER. I ask that the Military Academy appropriation bill be now taken up and proceeded with.

Mr. PEFFER. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me a moment to call up a little matter which I am confident will pass without objection?

Mr. TELLER. I gave way Thursday, and I believe I shall have to decline to yield to anything that can possibly bring up any controversy.

Mr. PEFFER. It will elicit no controversy, I am very confident.

Mr. TELLER. If I yield now I must yield to others. I know half a dozen Senators who want to call up little bills that they think will take no time. Let us go on with the appropriation bill for the time being.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4043) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that it was agreed to dispense with the informal reading when the bill was called up on Thursday last.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order was then made. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. TELLER. I understand the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. HAWLEY] desires to offer an amendment on the first page of the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, a bill passed both Houses, and has, I think, been signed by the President by this time, which provides for a chaplain at West Point, to be appointed for that special service, and not detailed from the general body of chaplains. In the bill which passed he was given the allowance of a captain, mounted. That renders it necessary to make an amendment on page 1, in line 9, to strike out the word "eight," before "professors," and insert "seven"; then, after the word "professors," to insert "and a chaplain, with the pay and allowances of a captain, mounted." The total, then, must be changed from "$27,000" to "$26,000." It is all practically one amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 9, before the word "professors," it is proposed to strike out "eight" and insert "seven"; after the word "professors," to insert "and a chaplain, with the pay and allowances of a captain, mounted," and in the same line, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-six" and insert "twenty-seven."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. On page 2, line 4, I move to strike out "ninety-nine" and insert "ninety-eight."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 4, before the word "dollars," it is proposed to strike out "ninety-nine" and insert "ninety-eight"; so as to read:

In all, for permanent establishment, $198,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VILAS. I desire to submit an amendment to the bill which has been reported favorably with an amendment by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TELLER. Let the amendment be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. —. That the Corps of Cadets shall consist of 2 from each State at large, 1 from each Congressional district, 1 from each Territory, 1 from the District of Columbia, and 10 from the United States at large. They shall be appointed by the President, and those appointed at large may be residents of any State in the Union. The two appointed at large from each State shall be actual residents of the State from which they are appointed, and the others shall be actual residents of the Congressional or Territorial districts or the District of Columbia, respectively, from which they purport to be appointed.

Mr. VILAS. The amendment as I originally proposed it provided for the appointment of 20 cadets from the United States at large, but was reported by the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment reducing the number to 10, and I have offered it in that form.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to hear some reason why we should increase the number of cadets. I understand that we have some cadets now whom we are not able to assign to duty.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, the amendment which I have proposed repeats the present language of the section of the Revised Statutes upon this subject, with simply the addition of the words "two from each State at large." So the only change proposed in the existing law is to add the appointment of 90 cadets at large, to be appointed by the President, as the law now provides with reference to all cadets, but probably, according to the usage which has always prevailed with reference to the appointments from Congressional districts, the nominations of these cadets would be made by Senators.

A word or two only in reference to this. It has been recommended by the successive Boards of Visitors year after year. It happened to be my fortune to participate in the examination last year at the Military Academy, as one of the members of the Board of Visitors, and the necessity for the increase of the efficiency in the Military Academy was very strongly impressed upon my mind, as well as upon the minds of those who were upon that board, and they have recommended this amendment to the law. Indeed, they recommended that the 10 from the United States at large, which are peculiarly the appointments of the President, should be increased to 20. The Military Committee, however, thought it wise to leave that as it has been, and therefore the amendment now is limited simply to the additional 90 cadets.

Mr. President, in the first place it will be observed that in the law as it stands, practically the greater number, almost all the cadets, are appointed, one from each Congressional district. That has been the law for a great number of years. During that time, however, the population of the United States has so greatly increased that the population of a Congressional district is now more than twice what it was when that provision was adopted. Thus the Military Academy does not now instruct probably more than one-half the proportionate number which it instructed at the time when the method of the appointment of the cadets and the limitation upon their number was provided.

The Military Academy has grown to be one of the most useful institutions in the country, and it ought to extend military instruction so as to provide among the body of the people a large number of persons who, in times of necessity, would be available for the military uses of the United States. It is a matter of common knowledge to all that among the very best officers who served their country during the war with the Southern States, those who had been instructed in the Military Academy and afterwards took their places in civil life were among the most efficient. The general who commanded our armies and who led them to eventual success was himself taken from the ranks of civil life. The general who next succeeded him as General of the Army came from the ranks of civil life. Among some of the most illustrious characters of the war were persons who had not served in the Army of the United States except for a brief period after their graduation from the Military Academy, but who had gone out in the world and who had taken their part in the ordinary duties of the citizen; but when occasion demanded they were found to be equipped and ready for the most useful service that could be rendered.

The Military Academy is maintained at a considerable expense by the people of the United States. The last Board of Visitors made some inquiry into that expense, and I should like to read a few words from one of the reports, which will show something of the way in which the large expenditures for the Academy have grown up:

> The act for the support of the Military Academy, which has for many years been one of the regular appropriations by the Congress, makes no provision for the pay of officers employed in the government of the Academy, instruction and discipline of cadets, and command of the Army detachments there, except for nine professors, and the additions granted certain officers because of the service required of them, nor for the pay of enlisted men, except the extra-duty pay and the pay of the band and field musicians employed at the post. That part of its appropriation which is for such extra pay of officers and enlisted men of the Army, together with that for the payment of professors and cadets, is disbursed by the Paymaster-General; while the moneys set apart by it for the more direct expenses of the Academy, and for the improvement of the public property at West Point, are disbursed by the quartermaster of the post.

The appropriation for the support of the Military Academy for the year ended with June, 1895, carried for the payment of the instructional force $53,226.70, yet the actual disbursements to officers engaged in instruction and discipline of cadets was $151,034.94, while to other officers and men there was paid $95,374.91, and the expenses of the instructional departments were $13,752.63, besides ordinary expenses and repairs, $51,719.05. Miscellaneous and incidental expenses, band and musicians, brought the total of the cost of what may be said to be the instruction and discipline at the Military Academy up to the sum, if I have added the amounts correctly, of $348,675.43, and that is exclusive of the pay of the cadets. So the regular appropriation for the support of the Military Academy does not by any means indicate the cost to the United States of the maintenance of the instruction and discipline at the Academy.

Sir, if you take the total actual cost to the United States of the maintenance simply of the instruction and discipline, you will find that it exceeds $1,000 apiece for each cadet actually receiving instruction. The total number of appointments which may be made is, I believe, 371, under the present law; but such is the result of examinations—and they are by no means excessively rigorous, according to the best observation I could give the subject—that only about from two-thirds to three-quarters of the total number appointed are admitted to the Academy. Thus the graduating class, which was, I believe, rather larger than usual this year, was, if I remember correctly, in the neighborhood of 60—58 is my remembrance. We are turning out annually then, from that Academy, which is maintained at a great charge, but a very small number of instructed young men. Take any college of this country, and I think it will be found that the average cost to the foundation, or the appropriation for the annual maintenance of the college, does not exceed $125 per pupil, while the cost at the Military Academy runs to over $1,000 per pupil, not counting the pay of the cadets. The instructional force at West Point is ample now to furnish tuition and proper instruction to a very much larger number of young men than are admitted to that institution.

It is said, as was remarked by the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] in charge of this bill, that we do not now have places in the Army to supply all the graduates of the Academy. I rather think that that is an error. I think they are substantially appointed to the Army; but I do not care for that in the purpose of this amendment. I am not seeking that the pupils of the Military Academy shall all be admitted to the Army. If there are some now who can not be admitted to the Army upon graduation, for the reason that there are not sufficient vacancies occurring regularly to admit so many, those who are not admitted must go into civil life. What is the reason why this Academy, which can furnish an education ample for any young man to begin civil life with, should not furnish that instruction to a greater number, even up to the full measure of its capacity? We can not do better in the way of preparation against the contingencies of war than to scatter through the United States a number of well-educated young men, instructed in the military art as well as in other branches, fitting them for the ordinary duties of civil life, who shall be, as it were, a reserve corps of efficient, well-educated, intelligent men for the conduct of such business as the necessities of the country may intrust to them in the way of military service? Therefore, without elaborating at great length upon this matter, I hope the amendment will at once meet the approbation of the Senate.

The amendment, as I said, has been recommended and recommended again. The recommendation has been reiterated by successive Boards of Visitors, by Secretaries of War, and by almost everybody who is acquainted with the circumstances of the military establishment. It will add little or nothing to the cost of the maintenance of the Academy, the only addition of any consequence being simply the addition of the pay of such cadets as shall be admitted. I do not think that the number I propose is nearly so great as ought to be added to the Corps of Cadets in the Academy. I think it would be well if we at least doubled it, for it will prove that out of 90, which this amendment, if adopted, provides for the admission of, probably not more than two-thirds or three-fourths can be admitted. That is the history with all appointments. Thus, we should distribute through the course of four years only some 60 or 70 more students. The whole number of cadets actually receiving instruction in the Academy would then not be equal to the number of appointments the law now provides.

Mr. FAULKNER. Are the quarters sufficient for such a number?

Mr. VILAS. Yes; the quarters are substantially sufficient, as I was informed, for the accommodation of the additional number which would be appointed. There would be no difficulty, as I believe, in that respect.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this amendment, from its very nature, so commends itself to the judgment of every person concerned who has inquired into the usefulness of the Military Academy that elaborate argument and discussion would rather tend to impair its strength than to increase it.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator state the number of cadets now in the Academy?

Mr. VILAS. If I remember correctly, the number of cadets at the time when the Board of Visitors were at West Point was 266. I am not sure that I have the number exactly correct. Of those, the graduating class, of course, retired at the last commencement, and another addition from among the appointments made for the present collegiate year was made, but how large that addition was, how many were saved out of the examinations, I am unable to answer the Senator at this moment.

Mr. HAWLEY. The total of all the appointments is 366, and that gives——

Mr. VILAS. The number is 371, I believe.

Mr. HAWLEY. That gives, we will call it, 90 to each class. The Senator says there were graduated at the Academy this last year about 58 or 60.

Mr. VILAS. Something in that neighborhood.

Mr. HAWLEY. That, from my recollection, is about the way it runs ordinarily. Owing to casualties, death, resignation, dismissal, or from failure to pass the examinations, the number is cut down, so that with this proposed addition to the number I think there would be graduating at the Academy scarcely more than perhaps about as many as the law now contemplates.

Mr. VILAS. Probably not so many.

Mr. HAWLEY. Only the usual complement, probably not so many as under existing law. Then we have a magnificent and costly plant there, to use a manufacturing term; fine grounds of immense value, fine buildings, and an unsurpassed corps of instructors, numbering how many?

Mr. VILAS. I have not right at this moment the number, but as to the cost I have the figures.

Mr. HAWLEY. Officers are detailed in addition to those named here.

Mr. VILAS. There are but 9 professors for whom regular appropriation is made in the Military Academy bill, but there are, all told, some 60 officers of the Army detailed and paid from the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. Of course receiving their ordinary compensation, with a little addition to it in some cases.

Mr. VILAS. If the Senator from Connecticut will permit me right there, I will call attention to the fact that although the Military Academy appropriation bill purports upon its face to provide for the Academy there was expended $387,000 out of the last appropriation bill, and up to the time when these figures were given me the Paymaster-General had paid, in addition to that sum, $198,754.91 to officers and men who were really assisting in the instruction at the Academy.

Mr. HAWLEY. It seems to me that we are not availing ourselves of the great advantages there, and not getting the full benefit from the large sums of money that we have expended and annually expend in carrying on the institution. I have had within twenty-five or twenty years the honor to twice serve on the Board of Visitors, and that was one of the obvious remarks, one of the things the members of the boards were always saying might be improved, and that we might just as well educate a larger number of men there, and if places could not be found for them in the existing Army they could be honorably mustered out after a certain time.

Mr. WALTHALL. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut if he agrees with the Senator from Wisconsin that this increase in the number of cadets will involve no additional expense for lodging?

Mr. HAWLEY. I understand they can lodge them. You see, we have now vacant beds to the number of eighty or ninety. I think they can lodge them without any trouble and feed them. I do not see that any additional sum will be needed, except for board and the annual allowance of $500 to each cadet.

Mr. WALTHALL. There will be no necessity for additional instructors?

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know, but I should think not by any manner of means, nor, perhaps, for barracks. I think there is no necessity for any additional barracks.

Mr. ELKINS. I favor the amendment, but it seems to me it should state explicitly how the President shall nominate the two cadets from each State at large. Now, the law under which the present number of cadets is appointed is found in section 1315 of the Revised Statutes, and it says:

> They shall be appointed by the President, and shall, with the exception of the 10 cadets appointed at large, be actual residents of the Congressional or Territorial districts, or of the District of Columbia.

It says nothing about their being nominated upon the recommendation of the Congressmen from the respective districts. That is taken for granted. But it seems to me we might as well settle that question right here. I do not think the President of the United States wants to be troubled with these appointments. I do not think he cares to be troubled about the 10 cadets at large.

We can settle the question by an amendment to the effect that these appointments shall be made upon the recommendation of the Senators. I suggest such an amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator from West Virginia will permit an interruption, I will state that I have prepared just such an amendment.

Mr. ELKINS. If it in terms meets the point I make I will accept the amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. With the consent of the Senator, I will send the amendment to the amendment to the desk and have it read.

Mr. VILAS. If the Senator will give me leave I will make one remark in regard to the matter.

The amendment which I propose is a repetition of the language of the Revised Statutes, and the only addition consists in the insertion of the words "two from each State at large."

Mr. ELKINS. I am aware of that.

Mr. VILAS. The custom has become as fixed as law that the appointments from the Congressional districts and the Territories are made upon the recommendation of the Representatives from the several districts, respectively, and the Delegates from the several Territories, respectively, and it did not seem to me that it would be quite becoming to insist upon the specific declaration here that the appointments of the two from each State at large should be made upon the recommendation of Senators.

Mr. ELKINS. If that is our meaning, it would not hurt to put it in the law.

Mr. VILAS. Not at all. It is merely a question as to whether we should take the course of being so specific in the matter where there can hardly be any occasion for that exactness and where, as it seems to me, we might be open to criticism.

Mr. ELKINS. As to the custom, I know it has the force of law in respect to the appointment of cadets from Congressional districts, but we are now making a new law or amending the present law, and we can be explicit, I think, without giving any offense or inviting any criticism whatever from any quarter.

If it is the intention and the purpose of the Senate to have these cadets nominated upon the recommendation of Senators, it will do no harm to say so in terms; and that would set the question at rest.

Mr. VILAS. I presume it would be necessary to add a similar provision in reference to Representatives and Delegates.

Mr. ELKINS. Let that take care of itself. I hardly think there is necessity for such a provision, however. There the custom has the force of law. But I have no objection to it there, either. I do not think the President wants this right.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the amendment suggested by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the amendment the following proviso:

> Provided, That the two cadets at large shall be appointed only on the written recommendation of the Senators from the State to which they are accredited, and all cadets, except those reserved to the President by general law, shall be made only on the written recommendation of the Representative of the Congressional district or Territory to which they are respectively accredited.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask that the amendment to the amendment be again read, in order that we may see what effect it will have, and whether the recommendation is to be by one Senator or by both Senators from a State.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will again be read.

The Secretary again read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the Senator from Nebraska whether the amendment to the amendment does not require the joint action and recommendation of both Senators as to each of the appointees.

Mr. ALLEN. The proposed amendment to the amendment does require the joint action of both Senators from a State, and, as I believe, wisely. I do not believe that because a State may be represented by two Senators entertaining different political views they could not come together in a joint recommendation in the interest of the public service. I think there could be no objection to the amendment to the amendment from that source.

I wish to say, while talking upon this subject, that we in the Western States especially feel a little bit jealous of the appointments that have been made to the Military Academy and to the Naval Academy. The law as it exists has been construed by some person, I do not know by whom, to authorize the President, if there is a failure to recommend within the time specified, to select a cadet from any part of the United States and accredit him to any Congressional district whose quota is not full. I know, for instance, that during the last Congress, possibly the preceding Congress, there was appointed to represent my Congressional district, the northeastern or Third district of the State of Nebraska, a boy from the District of Columbia, who perhaps was never 10 miles west of this city, and the thousands of boys in that district who are competent and are perfectly willing to represent the district in the Military Academy were deprived of their right to do so in consequence of that appointment.

Now, it may be said as an excuse for this condition that Representatives sometimes fail to make their recommendations within the time prescribed and when they are called on. But I am well persuaded that even such a failure ought not to authorize the President to select a boy from the State of New Hampshire, for instance, to represent a district in the State of Nebraska, or vice versa; that he ought to be required to make his appointment from the State to which the appointee is accredited, or the district to which he is accredited, if competent material can be found there to select from.

I was informed that in the case to which I referred no notice was received by the Representative to make the selection. I do not mean to say that the Secretary of War, or whoever had the appointing power, did not send a notice; I would not imply anything of the kind; but the mails are sometimes uncertain in this country, and in that case I am informed that no notice was ever received by the Representative to make a selection.

I think the amendment to the amendment is in the interest of keeping the representation of every State and Congressional district on a parity, if I may be permitted to use that expression, with every other State and district in the Union, and that the President, or whoever it may be, should be deprived of the power to take a boy from the District of Columbia and accredit him to a Congressional district 1,500 or 3,000 miles west of this city. It is only to cover cases of that kind that I offer the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I am very sorry to differ with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], who has been a later and better Secretary of War than I, and also with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], who was a good soldier; but I can not agree with them as to the amendment to the amendment.

It seems to me very much wiser and better to hold this appointment in the hands of the Commander in Chief of the Army. Every subsequent appointment is made by the President, and it seems to me a fitting thing that this initial step should be under his control. It is his duty to guard the Army and to protect it from any improper appointment, and I think the abuse of which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] speaks, if it proves to be an abuse, for I think the case he refers to must be an exceptional one, can be reached in some other way.

The law now is explicit that the cadets shall be taken from actual residents in each Congressional district. If any executive officer disobeys or evades the law there is a better way to reach it, it seems to me, than to change the law and inaugurate a system which, I think, would be much less military and decidedly objectionable.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Vermont permit me to interrupt him at this point?

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. A question may arise in making the appointments as to whether the boy is an actual resident of a State or district. Our courts in this country have differed very materially as to what constitutes residence, and between an actual resident and a legal resident there is a very broad distinction. A boy might go into the State of Nebraska, for instance, or the State of Vermont, and live there for four or five years and not be a citizen of the State.

Mr. PROCTOR. Very well. Then strengthen that clause in any way so as to make it clear that the appointees must be taken from the State. Make it "a legal resident," if necessary. I do not care how strong that provision is made, but I do insist that the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army, should be charged with this responsibility, as he is in every other step in the career of an officer. Every commission must come from the President. I believe the present is a wise system and that we ought not to depart from it.

Mr. ELKINS. The President can not appoint without the advice and consent of the Senate. He is not supreme in the appointment of officers.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont a question. Why should there be any difference between cadets at West Point and cadets at the Naval Academy? The law explicitly provides that those appointments shall be made on the nomination of the Representatives and Delegates in Congress. The appointments are made by the President. Now, is the military arm of the service of a higher character than the naval arm? Is it important that the President should have this power unlimited by any statute, so that he may properly discipline and control the Army, while he is not to have the same power over the appointment of naval cadets?

Mr. PROCTOR. If the system in the Navy is wrong, it is no reason why that of the Army should also be made wrong. Let the Navy system conform to the one that has been so successful in the Army.

Mr. CHANDLER. A fair answer to that, I think, is that the same system prevails in both cases. In the one case it is by statute and in the other it is by custom. If the system is to prevail, should not a statute so provide?

Mr. PROCTOR. The statute guards against any possible abuses. That is why I am in favor of the statute remaining as it is. I think the responsibility should be with the President.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator whether it is possible for Senators or Representatives to commit abuses in that connection in this enlightened age. Is it necessary to give the President the power to refuse to make appointments according to the nomination of a Senator or a Representative because they may do wrong and commit abuses?

Mr. PROCTOR. I think there have been cases where, with very good reason, appointments were refused. For that reason I think the law ought to remain as it is.

I am heartily in favor of the amendments proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS]. Fortunately, we are not warlike people; that is, we do not maintain a great standing army and a great navy, and have no occasion to do so. But there is all the more reason why we should be a military people; why we should diffuse as generally as possible military education and be prepared, if the time ever comes when the military strength of the nation must be called out, to manage it and handle it.

There is no way to do this so well as to have a large number of men distributed throughout the country who are competent to take charge of the reserve force. As the Senator said, the leading men in our war of the rebellion, the general who commanded the great armies of the West and led them to victory and also the general who commanded the armies of the East, were both graduates of West Point who had gone into the civil walks of life.

The education there acquired fits men admirably for other high positions. The scientific education obtained there makes them able engineers for great works of public importance. Very many prominent men in the country who have taken leading positions in other walks of life owe their qualifications and their positions to their education received at West Point. It is my recollection that every board—I know every one that has given this careful attention—has earnestly recommended an increase of the number of cadets at West Point.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I do not wish to occupy much time in discussing the amendment. Of course it will be borne in mind that the amendment is not in order, but I assume no one will make the point of order against it, as I think it is fair to discuss it thoroughly.

The proposition, I understand, is to add 90 cadets to the number of cadets now authorized by law, and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] argues that there will be no additional expense to the Government except for the pay of the cadets. That is true, perhaps, in one sense, and yet I can hardly think it possible that we can add about one-third, according to the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin, to the number of cadets without increasing somewhat the expenses incident to their education.

The Senator from Wisconsin shows that there are a large number of people assigned to duty at West Point in educating these youths for service in the Army. That is true; and the cadets receive there a very careful and minute education as respects the number in each class. So my apprehension is that if we shall enlarge the number of cadets there will also be a necessary enlargement of the number of those who are to instruct them.

But the amendment seems to have in it the idea that this is a good time for us to educate young men for the Army, and when they are educated at Government expense they shall either be idle in the Army or shall be permitted to resign from it. As I understand, the cadets are in the Army from the time they enter West Point. They are soldiers and officers of the Army from that time. In calculating the increased pay, what is called the longevity pay, their service or time at West Point is credited to them.

Now, in addition to that, if there are not places for the cadets after their graduation, they are appointed as second lieutenants, receiving the pay and allowances of second lieutenants until such time as there are vacancies in the Army. It so happens that at the graduation last year there were 20 cadets who were unassigned because of the fact that there were no vacancies in the Army, and they were made second lieutenants and received the pay of the arm of the service to which their graduation entitled them, as will be seen by the statute of 1886. Allow me to read the law. Here is the act passed in 1886, which is a modification of a former statute:

> That when any cadet of the United States Military Academy has gone through all its classes and received a regular diploma from the academic staff, he may be promoted and commissioned as a second lieutenant in any arm or corps of the Army in which there may be a vacancy and the duties of which he may have been judged competent to perform.

That is to say, if a young man graduates and is entitled to enter the Engineer Corps of the Army because of his standing in the class, and at the time of his graduation there is no vacancy in the Engineer Corps, then he is made a second lieutenant with all the pay and all the allowance of a second lieutenant, and receives that pay and those allowances until he is assigned to duty when a vacancy occurs.

I have a telegram here from the Secretary of War in response to a question directed to him. It is stated that there were 20 members of the last graduating class commissioned additional second lieutenants; that all these have since been assigned to vacancies except 3, 2 in the Engineer and 1 in the artillery corps; that there are besides 3 additional lieutenants of engineers, graduates of a former class; and that there are now in all 6 additional lieutenants, 1 of whom will be assigned to a vacancy now existing.

Mr. GALLINGER. There are 6 now?

Mr. ALLISON. There are 6 now. When a graduate at West Point is entitled to enter the Engineer Corps or the artillery corps of the Army he is, under existing law, made an additional lieutenant, and receives the pay and allowances authorized by law until such time as there is a vacancy. The experience of the last few years discloses that the number of graduates at the West Point Academy is practically on an equality with the number of vacancies from year to year.

Mr. SEWELL. Not quite. There are some appointments made from noncommissioned officers in the Army.

Mr. ALLISON. There is occasionally a sergeant in the Army promoted or one from civilian life gets an opportunity to enter the Army. But here it is proposed to add 90 lieutenants to the Army who are to graduate at West Point and become officers without an opportunity of serving in the Army. I submit that that is not a wise provision in our existing condition as to finances.

Mr. VILAS. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to say that it is not proposed to add 90 lieutenants to the Army. It is proposed to add 90 appointments to the number of cadets, who will be so distributed that probably only one-fourth of the number who are accepted after examination, and who finally sustain themselves in the course, will become graduates. It will hardly add more than 15, or at the most 18, annually.

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator from Wisconsin say that only 20 per cent of those who enter West Point graduate from West Point?

Mr. VILAS. Annually?

Mr. ALLISON. Twenty per cent annually.

Mr. VILAS. Yes; that is 80 per cent in four years, and that is more than the proportion who graduate.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand the point the Senator makes, but I call his attention to the fact that it only postpones the time when this additional number appear. For the first four years, probably, none will be added, because none can graduate before that time, but at the end of four years 100, or whatever the number is, will graduate, and then there will be 100 more graduates within a year. At the end of four years there will be 100 graduates, as I stated. For the present, of course, that will not be the case.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if he thinks that will probably distress our finances, commencing four years from now?

Mr. ALLISON. I am not arguing against the amendment on the ground that it will distress our finances. I am only showing that at this time, with a sufficient number of cadets at West Point to fill the vacancies in our Army, or practically so, it is proposed to add 90 cadets at an increased expenditure of certainly from $50,000 to $70,000 per annum, without including the additional cost of education; and I say this is proposed in view of the pressing fact that the same Visiting Board at West Point recommended for the convenience of the cadets who are already there $130,000 more than the committee of the House or the committee of the Senate saw fit to provide for in the pending bill, because we supposed that could be postponed for another year.

I call attention to this matter with great deference, because I see the Committee on Military Affairs believe it to be a wise provision. It may be that they propose to increase the Army, or think the increased number of officers will be needed when the four years shall have expired, but I very much wish that this matter could have been more carefully matured, and could have been introduced here as a separate bill and have full discussion as a separate measure, without placing it on this appropriation bill. And I think there is some reason to believe that the other House would hesitate to put this provision on without an opportunity of further debate in that body than can be had on an appropriation bill.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I regret that the amendment has been offered.

Mr. PROCTOR. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin by adding at the close of his amendment:

Any graduates unassigned to existing vacancies within one year after their graduation shall be honorably discharged from the service.

This would obviate the continuous expense.

Mr. VILAS. I shall be entirely willing to accept that amendment, especially if it would meet the objection which the Senator from Iowa urged in that particular. I would like, by the kindness of the Senator from Connecticut, General HAWLEY, to have read at the desk the recommendation of the Adjutant-General of the Army upon this proposed amendment. It has just been transmitted by the Secretary of War to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, February 8, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith an amendment intended to be proposed as a new section to the bill (H. R. 4043) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, which has been referred to the Department by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs.

The measure proposed by this amendment is to increase the maximum strength of the corps of cadets from 371 to 471 by adding to the present number 2 cadets from each State at large and 10 from the United States at large.

The amendment is recommended to favorable consideration. The plant at the United States Military Academy is already sufficient for the purpose proposed and the measure is in the interest of the service.

Very respectfully,

GEO. D. RUGGLES,
Adjutant-General.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the pending amendment is that of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS].

Mr. VILAS. I believe the amendment of the Senator from Vermont can be accepted, if there is no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Wisconsin to accept the amendment. It is now accepted.

Mr. VILAS. If the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska is to be insisted upon, in view of what was so well said by the Senator from Vermont, I should like to suggest this to him as a better form of expressing the amendment, perhaps, to meet the idea he has in view:

Provided, That of the two cadets from each State at large one shall be appointed on the recommendation of each Senator from such State, and that the one from each Congressional district and Territory shall be appointed on the recommendation of the Member of Congress from such district or the Delegate from such Territory.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, at this late hour I do not propose to detain the Senate for more than a few minutes. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] has given to this subject such laborious and intelligent research and presented the results of that research so clearly as to carry conviction to the Senate and the country. I think that the fate of this amendment might be safely trusted to the Senate without another word. But it has been suggested by some of the friends of the measure that a few words from me might not be out of place.

I am not a West Pointer, Mr. President, and on this account perhaps any suggestions from me may be regarded of less technical value; but they ought for the same reason, perhaps, to be received as also less partial than if made by a graduate of that Academy. Whatever of military education it has been my fortune to receive was obtained in another school. It came only from the stern and somewhat checkered experience of a soldier's life in the field. Recalling that experience and weighing impartially the considerations which favor this amendment, I am not permitted to doubt that it ought to be adopted. It seems to me that in the present condition of the country—I mean as to its means of defense—some such provision for increasing the educated soldiery of the country is imperative.

Of course, Mr. President, we all regret—every lover of peace and friend of arbitration—every thoughtful man regrets the necessity for military preparation in this age of enlightened progress; but we must recognize the fact that the necessity exists for increased coast defenses, increased naval power, as well as increased number of educated soldiers.

Even with our isolation from the great military powers of the world by reason of our surrounding oceans, we can not afford to stand still while all the civilized nations of the globe are increasing their armies and navies and the character and destructiveness of their armaments.

This necessity for preparation, Mr. President, is emphasized by the marvelous changes which have occurred and are still occurring in the arms and implements of war. It is said by high authority that these changes in the character of guns and engines of war are far greater in the last twenty-five years than in the whole of our past history—since the fathers fought with crude arms at Lexington and won with them at Yorktown—greater, perhaps, than in the preceding half dozen centuries.

Mr. President, I offer that fact as argument for this amendment. The necessity for action on the line indicated by this amendment and upon other lines of defense is further emphasized, Mr. President, by our recent experience. The country has just been aroused from its repose—startled from its fancied security as to its relations to other nations by the possibility of war—war with the most powerful nation in some respects on the globe. It is true that this experience has brought forth the renewed and gratifying assurance of absolute unity among the American people in support of that American doctrine enunciated by President Monroe. It has demonstrated that every section, State, and township is ready to uphold and enforce the rightful construction of that law at any cost. But I apprehend, Mr. President, that it would greatly promote the confidence and comfort of our people to know we were prepared in all respects for whatever issue might be involved.

This experience has also demonstrated that our people desire peace, are hoping and believing that some settlement will be reached on a basis just and honorable to both Great Britain and this Republic; but who doubts that these hopes of peace would be strengthened and our prayers for peaceful adjustment be more effective if backed by competent power? What surer guaranty of peace—may I not ask what nobler contribution to honorable, enduring peace—than thorough preparation for war? There is truth as well as grim humor in the homely aphorism, that war guns are peace preservers. But, Mr. President, our very deficiencies in these respects, the great cost of suitable defenses, and the long time required for their introduction, constitute another argument for this amendment.

Mr. President, I trust that I shall not be misunderstood by the Senate, by the country, or by others who might read these suggestions. I neither entertain nor mean to express or imply any doubt of our ability to successfully defend this country even in our present condition in case of war. We defended it as separate colonies by united action. We defended it in its infancy and weakness. It has survived fifty years of sectional alienation and bitterness which culminated in the bloodiest of civil wars. Of course, therefore, in any emergency we should be able to take care of it now. Now that this alienation and bitterness is gone, now with sections and States all concordant and all hearts beating as the heart of one man we could bid defiance to the world in arms.

But, Mr. President, it is not simply a question of ability to protect our country from a foreign foe, but a question of defending it with the least tax in money, and especially in men. In the chances of such inexpensive defense an educated soldiery for commanders is a mighty factor. It is true that great emergencies call to the front great leaders in all fields—and that will be the experience of the future; but, sir, you had as well tell me that special training was valueless to the painter or sculptor as to the soldier.

The advantages of trained leaders is demonstrated by all past experience. Even our war with Mexico, fought as it was so largely by volunteers, a war in which the South poured out its blood so freely, and in which we extended the borders of the Republic to the Pacific Ocean—even in that war the value of educated soldiers, although many of them were not in the Regular Army, was abundantly demonstrated. I offer that as an argument.

But, Mr. President, the policy of this Government, which I most cordially approve, of maintaining a small standing army further strengthens the reasons for the adoption of this amendment. Who can tell when some unexpected and trying complications may arise calling for the rapid mobilization of great armies? It is in such a contingency, which may occur at any time in our future, that we shall need these educated soldiers scattered among our people to drill and discipline the reserved military power in our patriotic youth. We need men who are themselves trained in the use of the new and destructive implements of war, trained to obedience and self-restraint, inspired by the lessons they learn at West Point and by a lofty spirit, to bring our untrained youth quickly to a high order of efficiency. In the words of Calhoun, when Secretary of War, the nation will need in such emergency educated skill to lead "its valor to victory."

Sir, we are not left without encouragement from highest sources. The early Presidents, Washington, Jefferson, Adams, Madison, and Monroe, all were impressed with the wisdom of the general policy now in view.

I therefore, Mr. President, as a means of future safety, whether in foreign war or domestic disturbance, give my approval and vote to this amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] has offered an amendment which he suggests as a substitute for my amendment, and he suggests in that connection that his substitute expresses my idea better than my own production. I am very thankful to the Senator from Wisconsin to supplement my poor education with his superior education in this respect, and to express my idea of the proposed amendment better and in more apt language than I am capable of expressing it myself; and I am inclined to accept in lieu of my proposed amendment the language which he uses.

However, there was a remark or two submitted by the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] which I believe in fairness I ought to reply to. I do not think we disagree as to the facts that the President of the United States, by virtue of being Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, should have the armed power of the nation well in hand. But I submit to the honorable Senator from Vermont that running along with that thought is the thought that every State in this Union shall be appropriately represented and adequately represented in both the Naval and the Military Academy, and that the practice has been, to some extent at least, so much so as to call public attention to the fact that in the case of vacancies which may exist in many of the States by reason of the failure of the Representative to make a representation, young men taken from other sections of the Union, and especially from the District of Columbia, have been appointed to those positions and accredited to States and Territories in which they never sojourned and in which their parents never lived, and that it is wrong.

I am perfectly willing to give the President of the United States, or the Secretary of War, as representing him, power to fill every vacancy in the Military Academy that may take place from any cause, but in doing that I want to have the Senators and Representatives consulted from the State to which the appointment is accredited. I do not think it is the part of wisdom or good policy to permit the President of the United States to make an appointment to either the Naval or Military Academy without a recommendation of the Senators or the Representatives in Congress from the State to which the appointment is accredited.

I am not going to detain the Senate very long, but let me ask what would be the consequence if we were to pursue the course pointed out by the honorable Senator from Vermont, whose vast experience in public life, and especially in the War Department, preeminently fits him to speak intelligently on this subject? The result would be that in a short time, if we should have a war with Great Britain, as seems to be imminent this evening, or a war with any other power, all the officers of the Army, or the great majority of them, would come from the District of Columbia. All the officers, or a great majority of them, in consequence of this system of irregularity in appointment, and this discrimination against the States and Territories of the Union, would come from the District of Columbia or some locality in the eastern part of this nation, and the private soldier, the man who carries his musket and fights the battles, would come from the States and districts which have been ignored in the disposition of the appointments in the Military Academy and in the Naval Academy. I am perfectly willing that we should have an Army big enough and a Navy big enough to protect the United States, although I am decidedly at this time against any proposed increase of either.

Mr. President, I want the officers and private soldiers and noncommissioned officers to come from States and Territories according to their population and according to the districts represented in the Halls of Congress. If a vacancy occurs in the State of Nebraska or in the State of Vermont, why can not the President go to the State of Vermont or the State of Nebraska and get his appointee and fill the vacancy? Why should he confine himself to a little District here, 10 miles square, and say that a boy who was born here under the shadow of the Capitol——

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. ALLEN. In a moment.

That a boy who was born here under the shadow of the Capitol, and who never has been as far west as the west line of this District, should represent a district in the State of California, or a district in the State of Colorado, or a district in some other State?

Now I will hear the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. SEWELL. The case stated by the Senator from Nebraska is an exceptional one. The universal practice is to appoint from the district. It is only when some member of the House of Representatives, after repeated notice, has neglected his duty to appoint that an appointment is made outside of the particular district.

Mr. ALLEN. That is no answer at all to the argument. I say to the Senator from New Jersey that I am perfectly willing the President should exercise this power; but when he exercises it, let me ask the honorable Senator why he should not go to the State of New Jersey, where the vacancy exists? Why should he take a boy from the District of Columbia and say, "I will appoint him from the First district of the State of New Jersey and accredit him to that district"? Does it not, in the long run, give the District of Columbia or some other district or State undue representation in the Military and Naval academies of the United States?

What I insist upon is, not that the President shall be deprived of this power if a member of Congress fails to exercise it, but that in exercising the power he shall be confined to the district or the State that is not represented in consequence of the failure of its Representative or Senator to make the proper recommendation.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question, if I may. I am profoundly ignorant of most of the rules as to the appointment and promotion of officers, but I am under the impression that there has heretofore by law been an opportunity year after year, with perhaps the intermission of a year at times, of promoting men from the ranks to officership in the Army. I understand it is the blue ribbon that is given to meritorious privates, which impels them to their duty and leads them to hope that there is something for them beyond a corporalship or a sergeantship, and there is the one chance before them that, if they faithfully perform their duty for years, they may themselves wear the epaulets and rise to officership and command. I am told this is so. Now, I desire to ask the Senator from Wisconsin, if this be so, whether the amendment which he proposes will not forever cut off and debar, unless our Army is increased, any further chance of promotion from the ranks?

Mr. VILAS. I will answer the Senator from Colorado by saying that I think it will not.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator please explain why it will not? If there are now, as the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] said a few moments ago, in answer to some remarks of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], but occasional vacancies, and some of those vacancies are filled from the ranks, if you double your appointments to West Point, and the vacancies are to be filled from West Point, what opportunities will there be for filling vacancies by promotion from the ranks?

Mr. VILAS. Precisely the same there are now. Whenever the President thinks that the circumstances are such that he ought to promote meritorious soldiers from the ranks, the power remains with him as it is with him now.

Mr. SEWELL. By law the President has to take the appointee first from the Academy, second from those that are surplus, and after everything else is exhausted he goes to the ranks.

Mr. VILAS. If the Senator from Colorado desires——

Mr. BATE. If the Senator from Wisconsin will pardon me, it is likewise the law now that a noncommissioned officer may prepare himself to undergo a competitive examination and on successfully passing it he is entitled to a commission. It is confined to noncommissioned officers.

Mr. VILAS. That, perhaps, is a better answer than the one I was about to make to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SEWELL. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE] has made a mistake as to the law. While the noncommissioned officer has the right to be examined for promotion, there are only about six or eight appointments a year, and the President has first to exhaust the Academy before he can appoint from the ranks.

Mr. BATE. I did not say that the noncommissioned officers had an absolute right to be appointed over the West Pointers, but they have the right to seek such promotion.

Mr. SEWELL. As the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] said, there are to-day some of the brightest young men who were graduated last year simply serving with doubtful commissions, and are not assigned to duty. I am in favor of the increase proposed on general principles, but I want the Senate to take into consideration this idea, that if the increase is made to the number stated you will take away all hope from the young men who are trying to perfect themselves in the Army in order to become commissioned officers.

Mr. GORDON. May I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that possibly the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, retiring these officers from commission one year afterwards, might relieve the Army of the embarrassment he suggests?

Mr. SEWELL. That raises another question entirely. That would be simply making a general educational institution of West Point for other than military purposes at the expense of the Government. I do not believe that a young man ought to be discharged after having devoted himself to this special profession.

He ought to look forward to promotion in that profession, and he ought not to look forward to being discharged by reason of there being no vacancies. We had a case of that kind in the Navy a few years ago, where a whole class of young men were put out, nine-tenths of whom have not succeeded in life by reason of the fact that the whole current of their ideas and thoughts of labor were changed by an act just like this.

Mr. VILAS. One object of the amendment, in my opinion, is to provide that a good number of young men every year, who have been educated at the Military Academy, shall leave the Army and go into civil life. It is to provide the means which are so abundant for military instruction at the West Point Academy for the use of the young men of the country, and I do not see that there is the least difficulty in retaining at the same time the authority and power of the President to promote from the ranks in meritorious cases, with whatever incentive may now exist, and if there be need for any change in the law to effect that, I should cheerfully agree to it.

Mr. CHANDLER obtained the floor.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Let me make a suggestion, as the Senator from Wisconsin was replying to me. If, under the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, the force would be doubled, then there would be absolutely no chance for an appointment from the ranks, for there would be no vacancies. The retiring of men to private life is only after vacancies are filled at the expiration of a year. If the Senator from Wisconsin desires that there should be any further promotions from the ranks he must certainly include in his amendment a provision that there shall be annually appointed a certain number from the ranks.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator from Colorado hardly deals with anything less than hyperbole. An amendment which would add from fifteen to eighteen to an annual class can hardly be said to double the number of cadets at West Point. So far as the other amendment is concerned, it is enough, it seems to me, that we should deal with one thing at a time. We ought not to attempt in this section to endeavor to reform all provisions of law.

Mr. TELLER. It is quite evident that if we should attempt to get a vote to-night it would not be very satisfactory. I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 18, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 17, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, February 15, was read and approved.

CERTAIN LANDS IN THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has a matter which, by consent of the House, comes up immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker I ask that the bill which was under consideration on Saturday (H. R. 5819) to provide for the examination and classification of certain lands in the State of California, be put to a vote. I understand that Mr. Geary, an ex-member of this House, had a conversation with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], and he had no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5819) to provide for the examination and classification of certain lands in the State of California.

The SPEAKER. Were there any amendments?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of California, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 2175) to extend the time for the completion of the incline railway on West Mountain, Hot Springs Reservation; and

An act (H. R. 1464) to amend chapter 76, laws of 1893.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. By direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I make the report which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4321) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes, together with the amendments of the Senate thereto, having considered the same, beg leave to report as follows:

They recommend concurrence in the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 7, 8, 10, 34.

They recommend nonconcurrence in the amendments numbered 5, 6, 9, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, and 62.

They recommend concurrence in the amendment numbered 4, with an amendment as follows:

After the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"For printing 500,000 copies of part 2 of the Annual Report of the Secretary of Agriculture for the year 1895, as required by section 73 of the act entitled 'An act providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents,' approved January 12, 1895, $300,000."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I should be glad to have this bill considered in the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] asks unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Mr. Speaker, has this bill been printed with these amendments?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah asks if this bill is printed with the amendments.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly; the gentleman can get it by sending to the document room. It is House bill 4321, with Senate amendments, and is printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is recognized.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, on the 21st day of January the House passed what is known as the urgent deficiency bill. It carried $4,421,000.

The practice has grown up in late years to pass two deficiency bills, one early in the session, to cover items required by the public service, the other near the close of the session, which takes up all items of deficiency. This practice grew up out of the necessities of the Government service.

The Committee on Appropriations took somewhat of a new departure when they reported this bill. Wherever we recommended appropriations at all we exhausted the subject, and aimed to cover, and substantially did cover, every item that was before the committee by estimate. We included all items which we considered to be necessary for the public service before the close of the fiscal year. Hence the bill was over $4,000,000, the largest urgent deficiency bill that ever passed this House. It went to the other end of the Capitol. The Senate considered the bill and amended it and passed it so as to make it carry $1,623,000 additional, making the bill over $6,044,000.

There has been a controversy for many years between the House and Senate as to what is the duty of the House touching appropriation bills. We have always claimed—and that claim has been substantially concurred in between the two bodies, that the House of Representatives should originate the general appropriation bills. The Senate have always claimed that they could originate them, and under their power as a coordinate branch of Congress they have practically added to the House bills whatever seemed to them to be proper. This matter was discussed in the Senate upon this bill. Much was said that perhaps I ought not to consume time in repeating, and in fact perhaps it would not be in order for me to state what this Senator and that Senator and the other Senator said. Suffice it to say, that when it was all said, with one exception the Senators seemed to be quite vigorous in protesting that the Senate had just as much power touching appropriation bills as had the House.

There seemed to be a consensus of opinion that when they added $1,623,000 to this urgent deficiency bill they were performing a duty that the House had failed to perform. Possibly something was said of a little capital that somebody desired to make. Well, now, I think it is due to the House that I should call attention to this and see what are the facts with respect to this claim. I will just analyze this bill for a moment. The amount as the bill passed the House was $4,400,000; as it passed the Senate, $6,044,000. The items added in the Senate are as follows:

Preparing report of World's Columbian Exposition	$18,006.10
Reimbursement of T. W. Palmer, president World's Columbian Exposition	1,998.35
To open Jupiter Inlet, Florida	500.00
Navy-yard, Brooklyn	50,000.00
Naval station, Key West, Fla	4,000.00
Naval War College, Rhode Island	2,000.00
Equipment, Navy	50,000.00
Claims for surveying public lands	7,297.28
Library of Congress building	480,000.00
Library of Congress, assistants	1,125.00
United States Senate	27,473.21
Total	642,399.94

Now, then, these items never were before the House committee by estimate or otherwise. Gentlemen understand that under the rules of the House the Committee on Appropriations gets jurisdiction through estimates submitted through the Secretary of the Treasury, referred through the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CANNON. If it is in this line.

Mr. SAYERS. We can not hear the gentleman.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. I understand that one of the Senate amendments is an appropriation to the president of the World's Fair Commission for preparing a report.

Mr. CANNON. I will come to that presently——

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. I would ask if that is correct?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; not to the president, but to the director-general——

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Yes, the director-general.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). Who deposits his report, and about which the House committee had no hearing and no estimate. That is put on and we recommend nonconcurrence. Now, then, let me call your attention to the items added of which the House or Committee on Appropriations were advised after the bill was under consideration or had passed the House.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him one moment?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. SAYERS. Will you also state in reference to the item for the payment of letter carriers that that was not before our committee?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; I am going to come to that. I will give the other items:

To reimburse railroads for transporting certain negroes from Mexico	$5,087.09
Expert counters in Treasury	7,500.00
Battlefield, Antietam, Md	7,000.00
Horses for cavalry and artillery	30,000.00
Back pay and bounty	75,000.00
Eleventh Census	15,000.00
United States court expenses	309,739.19
Court of Private Land Claims	10,000.00
Judgments, United States courts	22,866.25
Judgments, Court of Claims	441,891.80
Total	924,084.33

So it will be seen that, of these matters that never were submitted to the House until after our bill was completed, the Senate, on its own motion and on estimates sent to it, put on this bill some $600,000; so that there were left only $56,000 that the Senate have put on by way of amendment that the House have had any jurisdiction of. Of that $56,000 a part of it was $20,000 for lighting the insane asylum. The House committee did not recommend that for the reason that at the time, nor yet, while we are satisfied it ought to be lighted, we were not satisfied that it was being properly administered. The history of it, in a word, is this: In 1893 they asked $20,000 for this purpose. That was the full estimate; we gave it. In 1894 they came back and said, "It cost a little more than we expected and we want $10,000 more." We gave it. Now they come by their estimates and say, "We want $20,000 more," making $50,000 for a little electric-light plant for the insane asylum. On inquiry we did not think that the Government was getting its money's worth and we were tired of being paltered with; and to ascertain if the proposed expenditure of this sum was to be made with due diligence to protect the Government, we did not feel that we ought to recommend it; but the Senate put it on.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman allow me just a moment?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understood the gentleman to enumerate certain items there and to allege that the House committee have never had jurisdiction of those items. Does he mean to say that they would not have been in order under the rules of the House in the Committee on Appropriations to be considered, or is it the fact that they were not submitted to the committee?

Mr. CANNON. Just as I meant to say, under the rules of this House the Committee on Appropriations gets jurisdiction upon estimates transmitted from the Secretary, through the Speaker, and referred to the committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then, I understand the gentleman to say that these items were never transmitted to the committee.

Mr. CANNON. Exactly; at least not transmitted in time for consideration by the House Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. Never before the committee prior to the consideration of this bill in the House and its passage.

You may say, "Well, what is the matter?" Not much of anything, except the lecture which this House has received in another body. I am inclined to believe that most of these items are correct, though we have no official information about them. We have recommended nonconcurrence for the purpose of hearing from the Senate conferees as to the information or the estimates they may have to justify these items. We wrote into the bill as it passed the House every item of deficiency for this year and former years in the Department of Justice submitted up to the time we prepared the bill. I understand that after we had passed the bill here the Department of Justice certified to the Senate over $300,000 more. We shall find out about that. If that be so, it is, of course, perfectly proper for that amount to go in. As to a printing amendment put on by the Senate, we recommend that the House concur in that amendment with an amendment by the House carrying $300,000 for the publication of the Agricultural Report of 1895. This is made necessary by the Richardson printing bill, which provides for the printing of these reports, and as there is no money appropriated for the purpose we recommend this appropriation. Heretofore the appropriation has been made by a joint resolution reported from the Committee on Printing authorizing the printing and prescribing the number.

Mr. RICHARDSON. A self-appropriating resolution.

Mr. CANNON. The printing law authorizes the printing of 500,000 copies of the report and provides how they shall be distributed. After this bill passed the House the Public Printer sent in his estimate of $300,000. That estimate went to the Senate, but for some reason that coordinate branch of the Government, which claims to have just as much authority as we have to originate appropriation bills, did not put in the item. We sent for the Public Printer and found that $300,000 appropriated now would give us the report for distribution in June, whereas if we did not appropriate the money available until the next fiscal year we should have to wait for it until October. For this reason we recommend this appropriation by way of a House amendment.

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman has answered my question. I wanted to know when the reports were to be ready.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Speaker, a word in conclusion. I want to keep strictly within the rules of this House, but when I read the debates in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, speaking for the committee over which I have the honor to preside and for the House, I must say that when we are criticised in another body for alleged nonperformance of our duty, I do not look upon such criticism with delight, especially when every word of it is based on false premises. Far be it from me, Mr. Speaker, to seek to take away from any parliamentary body in this or any other country the privilege of trying to justify the wisdom of its own action and its own existence, and possibly that had better be done even upon a false foundation than not done at all. I have many times noticed that some people having great ability make their best speeches when they are not embarrassed by the facts surrounding the matter considered. Having said this much, I shall ask that the report of the committee be adopted, that the House concur as the committee recommend and nonconcur in the items I have mentioned, in order that we may hear from the Senate conferees the reasons of that body for putting on these amendments.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I should like a minute or two when the gentleman gets through.

Mr. PICKLER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I will take the floor again and yield for my friend's question, but I wish to yield now to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] as much time as he desires.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to criticise the action of the majority of the Committee on Appropriations. In fact, sir, this is a unanimous report. I concur fully in what has been said by the chairman of the committee in reference to the bill and amendments. But I wish to make this further remark, that while this bill is much larger than any urgent deficiency bill that has heretofore passed, it contains, and will contain when it becomes a law, more than a million dollars of appropriations which are not, in the technical sense of the term, deficiencies. In other words, there will be more than a million dollars carried upon this bill and also upon the general deficiency bill which can not be properly charged to any dereliction on the part of the last Congress. My judgment is, and I believe the distinguished gentleman at the head of the Committee on Appropriations will agree with me, that the deficiency appropriations for this session of Congress will be far less than the deficiency appropriations of any preceding Congress for many years past.

Another word in regard to the amendment which is proposed to the Senate amendment covering the appropriation of $300,000 for the publication of the Agricultural Report for the fiscal year 1895. The necessity for this appropriation does not arise from any default of the last Congress, because at the last session of the last Congress the sum of $300,000 was appropriated for the publication of the report for 1894, and that was the only estimate we had. The Public Printer now submits that if, instead of delaying this appropriation until the passage of the sundry civil bill, we give the $300,000 for the publication of the report of 1895, he will have it ready for distribution, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois, in the month of June next, instead of having it delayed until October or November, as has been usual.

I will say further, in addition to what the gentleman from Illinois has said, that whatever reflection has been made upon the Committee on Appropriations of the House or upon the House itself, in any quarter whatever, is unjust and has no foundation in fact. Of the more than a million and a half dollars added to this bill by the Senate, only a very small sum was before the Committee on Appropriations of the House for consideration. As to the asylum appropriation of $20,000, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] who sits before me, who was a member of the Committee on Appropriations in the last Congress and in the Fifty-second Congress as well, will remember that the superintendent of the asylum came before us and said that $20,000 would be amply sufficient for the asylum, and it was given to him freely. In the next Congress he returned and said that he would need $10,000 more, and that also was given to him freely; but when he came before the committee at the present session and asked, in addition to these sums, $20,000 more, the chairman of the committee very properly required that he should furnish some facts which would show the necessity for such an increase.

Mr. DINGLEY. In either of these Senate amendments is there an appropriation for an object in the nature of a claim which, under the rules of the House, ought to be referred to the Committee on Claims for consideration there?

Mr. SAYERS. There may be one or two; but I hardly think more.

Mr. CANNON. I do not recollect any.

Mr. SAYERS. Nor do I. As stated by the gentleman from Illinois, these amendments, or a large number of them, will be accepted by the House conferees; and the only object in consuming the time of the House with this explanation was to answer some very improper and unjustifiable reflections made upon the House and one of its committees in the other branch of Congress.

Mr. CANNON. I yield now to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. DOOLITTLE].

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to Senate amendment No. 26, on page 17, which provides for an appropriation of $10,000 to be used in defraying the expenses of the so-called Puyallup commission. This commission was appointed three years ago to obtain the consent, so far as possible, of the Puyallup allottees and the Puyallup Indians to the sale of the reservation lands proper of the Puyallups. There are about 600 acres of school lands—reservation lands proper. The balance of that reservation has been allotted to the Indians, who are holding in severalty and who are citizens of the United States.

I had a conversation with the Secretary of the Interior about the time this bill was being considered in the Senate, and he stated to me that $7,500 would be sufficient for this purpose. He further said that he was inclined to believe that the restrictions upon the sale of these lands should be entirely removed by as early a date as the 1st of next December. There will be found in the Indian appropriation bill, when it is taken up here for consideration, a provision that the act of the legislature of Washington in relation to the removal of these restrictions shall be in force after December next.

There have been three commissioners at work out there for three years. They have been paid nearly $14 a day each for such services as they have rendered to the Puyallup Indians. The amount paid for these services is to be taken out of the proceeds of the sale of the Indian lands—a provision which I believe to be most inequitable and wrong in principle. I do not think these commissioners should be continued in office at their present very high compensation. If an appropriation is to be made here, I desire that it shall be made in the Indian appropriation bill and shall run parallel with the other provision to which I have referred.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman refers to the Senate amendment?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do.

Mr. CANNON. Allow me to ask how much of this land of the Puyallups is there remaining?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. A very large proportion of it—in fact, nearly all—remains unsold. There was, for a time, a good deal of objection on the part of the allottees to the sale of any of these lands under the efforts and through the ministrations of these commissioners. I understand that recently the commissioners have obtained the consent to some extent—I do not know to what extent—of the Puyallup allottees. There never was any serious objection so far as the school lands, or, as we term them, the reservation lands proper, were concerned. The Indians desired, of course, as any other citizens would, to receive the fair purchase value of their lands. They are an intelligent body of Indians. They never have caused the Government any trouble or any expense.

I wish to state that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX], when the Indian appropriation bill comes up, will offer an amendment providing for an appropriation of $7,500, in accordance with the suggestion of the Secretary of the Interior, for the purpose of continuing the labors of these commissioners until the 1st of next December, but reducing their number to two and their salaries to $10 a day, which would certainly be a very ample compensation.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Then your idea is to cut out this amendment of the Senate?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes, sir; I want it struck out altogether, unless it conforms to the honorable Secretary's recommendation for $7,500.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Washington says he desires this amendment to go out unless the Secretary's suggestions are met?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes; unless the sum appropriated can be cut down to $7,500, which I presume can not be done; and there ought also to be a provision that the limitations provided by the statute of the State of Washington shall be accepted.

Mr. CANNON. Have allotments been made to all these Indians substantially?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Oh, yes; long since. And when these restrictions have been removed the period of time remaining under the provisions of the law now existing will be only about six years.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then, as I understand from the statement of the gentleman from Washington, this amendment of the Senate is, in fact, new legislation extending an old law.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The object is to continue these commissioners.

Mr. DINGLEY. But the time has expired under the law as it now stands.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Oh, no; this was to be a continuing commission, I suppose, under the provisions of the law.

Mr. DINGLEY. Without any limit whatever?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No, sir; but there must be a limit to this sort of thing, because the heart of these allotted lands is being eaten out, and the Indians are being deprived of their just rights. I do not propose, if any effort I may make can prevent it, that this thing shall go on indefinitely and forever until the value of the lands is destroyed.

Mr. DINGLEY. According to the gentleman's statement, this provision does not belong to a deficiency bill, but should be inserted, if anywhere, in the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. CANNON. I understand from the gentleman's explanation that substantially all these Indians have received their allotments.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Oh, yes.

Mr. CANNON. That is, their homes?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The amendment of the Senate reads:

To select and appraise such portions of the allotted lands within the Puyallup Indian Reservation, Wash., as are not required for homes for the Indian allottees.

Now, they have been about three years at this, as I understand it?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes, sir; and the Secretary says that the result of their labors has been altogether disproportionate to the amount of money expended heretofore.

Mr. CANNON. And as I understand the gentleman, he is inclined to the opinion that this commission should not be extended further?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Not unlimitedly, of course. I am willing that they shall continue for a few months longer. But there certainly ought to be a limit to the work.

Mr. SAYERS. I understand the gentleman to say that the Committee on Indian Affairs has this matter under consideration?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes, sir; and will make a report upon it.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Let me suggest also to the gentleman from Illinois that we have determined that the whole matter shall be wound up not later than next December.

Mr. CANNON. I am very glad to have the benefit of the gentleman's suggestion to take with us into the conference.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me a moment? I do not understand whether the Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence in the Senate amendment No. 11 or not.

Mr. CANNON. No; we recommend nonconcurrence.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. I would like to ask if it has been called to the attention of the committee that the report made by the director-general of the World's Columbian Exposition has not been signed by anybody, has not been referred to any committee of the commission to pass upon, and that it is not, in the true sense of the word, authoritative. I have been informed that such are the facts in regard to the report—that it has never been brought before the commission, and has not been signed by the one who prepared it. Does the Committee on Appropriations think that it would be proper to make the appropriation under such circumstances?

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman from Utah that this is a Senate amendment put in on information given to the Senate committee. The House has had no estimate for its information in the matter. I will state, however, that we apprehend it may turn out that the director-general, at his own expense, has made this report, as the law made it his duty to do. I apprehend that it will turn out not to have been submitted to the national commission for the reason that the national commission has not for a very long time had a meeting and can not have a meeting unless an amount is appropriated covering some twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars to pay its expenses.

But we recommend nonconcurrence, and will give the matter consideration in the conference committee. When we consider the amendment, if we are to consent to it, or if we disagree, as we may disagree, we will be in a position to inform the House fully of all the facts.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him as to the amendment No. 27? I understand that this is a motion to nonconcur.

Mr. CANNON. As to most of the Senate amendments it is. We recommend nonconcurrence in the amendment No. 27.

Mr. PICKLER. I do not desire to combat the views of the committee, but wish to call attention to the fact that these surveys have been performed, and this is the amount of some small balances due to the surveyors. I will be very glad if the committee would give the matter very careful consideration.

Mr. SAYERS. We had no information respecting the claim when we made up the bill.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman from South Dakota, and in passing answer the question of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], asked a little while ago, that possibly here is one of the items that is in the nature of a claim; possibly not an audited account; but I am unable to say. It has that appearance.

Mr. DINGLEY. Which is that?

Mr. CANNON. That is the item to which the gentleman from South Dakota calls attention. Whether it is an audited account or not I can not say, or whether it is a mere claim. But I am inclined to the opinion that it is a claim.

Mr. PICKLER. It is for work performed, and the accounts have been approved by the Commissioner of the Land Office.

Mr. CANNON. We will ascertain, of course, all the facts in the conference committee.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman from Illinois will yield to me for a moment, the gentleman is well aware that it has been the custom of the other body, in considering the appropriation bills, frequently to place in them, and send into conference, appropriations for objects that are distinctly in the nature of claims, and it seems to me when it is found that distinct claims are thus inserted which, under the rules of the House, would be referred to the Committee on Claims—the Appropriations Committee having jurisdiction of the matter in the House—that there ought not to be, on the part of the Committee on Appropriations, any concessions to the Senate giving advantage to one claim over others or the great body of claims.

Mr. CANNON. I heartily concur with the remarks and suggestions of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. SAYERS. But the gentleman from Illinois knows that this is the very character of amendment that is the most difficult to dispose of or defeat in conference.

Mr. CANNON. Gentlemen all understand how difficult it is for somebody who, as a servant of the House, tries to carry out its rules, or for a committee that does the best it can to conform to the rules in its service of the House—how exceedingly difficult it is to observe the rules and perform its duties and stand against the urgent personal request of individuals from time to time.

Mr. PICKLER. I wish to call the attention of the conferees of the House to these small sums for surveyors and deputy surveyors. Of course there can be no question about the justice of these claims when properly presented. These claims are not visionary, but they are for money that has been well earned by very laborious work in the surveying of these public lands. These are poor men, who are dependent upon this money for their living, and they ought to be paid as soon as the items can be properly gotten at. I merely desire to call attention to the justice of the claim. Now, I wish to ask the gentleman in regard to amendment No. 47, whether that amendment covers any of these judgments for Indian depredation claims?

Mr. CANNON. It does not cover any Indian depredation claims or judgments.

Mr. PICKLER. What is the character of these judgments?

Mr. CANNON. Judgments in the Federal courts under the Tucker-Edmunds Act, and also certain judgments of the Court of Claims.

Mr. PICKLER. I am not interested in those judgments under the Tucker-Edmunds Act.

Mr. CANNON. All of which judgments were certified since the bill passed the House, if certified at all.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote upon concurrence in the amendments recommended by the committee and nonconcurrence in the other amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] moves that the following amendments be concurred in:

The Clerk read as follows:

They recommend concurrence in the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 7, 8, 10, 34.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask that the vote be taken in gross.

Mr. CANNON. The report of the committee identifies the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires that they be read to the House.

The amendments in which concurrence was recommended were read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring.

The amendments were concurred in.

The remainder of the report of the Committee on Appropriations was then agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. I move a conference.

The motion of Mr. CANNON was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. CANNON, Mr. NORTHWAY, and Mr. SAYERS.

SALE OF BONDS, ETC.

Mr. DALZELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to submit the report which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the resolution of inquiry hereinafter set out, having considered the same, report a substitute therefor, and recommend the adoption of said substitute.

SUBSTITUTE.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to inform the House—

First. What was the aggregate amount of bonds issued and sold under the resumption act of 1875, and also what was the aggregate sum realized therefrom, specifying the character of coin received, between the passage of said act and March 1, 1893; and also the aggregate amount of bonds offered and sold under such act, and the aggregate sum realized therefrom, between March 1, 1893, and January 1, 1896, giving amount, rate, character of bond, and sum realized for each issue; and also what was the amount of gold in the Treasury reserve for redemption of United States legal-tender notes January 11, 1879, and what was the amount of gold reserved for such purpose March 1, 1893, and also the amount reserved on January 1, 1896.

Second. What was the aggregate amount of United States legal-tender notes redeemed by the Treasury between January 1, 1879, when the resumption of specie payments took effect, and March 1, 1893, and what was the aggregate amount redeemed between March 1, 1893, and January 1, 1896, specifying separately the amount of greenbacks, so-called, and the amount of Treasury notes thus redeemed, and not including the Treasury notes thus redeemed, and not including the Treasury notes redeemed and canceled as provided by the act of July 14, 1890, and also specifying the kind of coin, whether gold or silver, used in such redemption.

Third. What was the amount of greenbacks, so called, less currency certificates held by national banking associations, and what was the amount of Treasury notes in the Treasury March 1, 1893, and also January 1, 1896; also, what was the amount of United States legal-tender notes and currency certificates held in this reserve by national banking associations at each of such dates, or at the time nearest to such date for which the Treasury has official returns.

Fourth. What was the amount of United States legal-tender notes on deposit in the Treasury March 1, 1893, and also January 1, 1896, as the 5 per cent fund for the redemption of the notes of national banking associations.

Fifth. What disposition was made of such of the United States legal-tender notes as were redeemed from January 1, 1879, to March 1, 1893, and did not remain as cash in the Treasury at the latter date; and also what disposition was made of such of the United States legal-tender notes as were redeemed between March 1, 1893, and January 1, 1896, and did not remain as cash in the Treasury at the latter date.

Sixth. What was the surplus or the deficiency of revenue, as the case may have been, each fiscal year, or part of year, from July 1, 1879, to March 1, 1893, and from March 1, 1893, to July 1, 1895, and for the first half of the fiscal year ended January 1, 1896; what disposition was made of the surplus in each fiscal year; and also from what source or sources the requisite means were obtained to pay so much of the current expense of carrying on the Government, pensions, and interest on the public debt as was in excess of the revenue in any such fiscal year or part of fiscal year.

Seventh. What was the amount paid on account of the reduction of the principal of the interest-bearing public debt, including premium on bonds redeemed each fiscal year and part of fiscal year from July 1, 1879, to March 1, 1893; how much of such amount was derived from surplus revenue, and how much from the fund for redemption of notes of national banking associations in liquidation or reducing circulation, etc., which was covered into the Treasury by the act of July 14, 1890; and also how much the interest-bearing debt was increased between March 1, 1893, and January 1, 1896.

Eighth. What was the amount of legal-tender notes held in the Treasury as the deposit of national banking associations in liquidation or reducing or retiring their circulation for the redemption of their outstanding circulating notes, January 1, 1879, March 1, 1885, March 1, 1889, and also July 14, 1890, when this fund was covered into the Treasury; what was the amount of such notes of national banking associations redeemed from the fund between January 1, 1879, and March 1, 1885, and between March 1, 1885, and March 1, 1889, and also between March 1, 1889, and July 14, 1890; also what was the amount of legal-tender notes paid into the Treasury by national banking associations in liquidation or reducing or retiring their circulation between July 14, 1890, and March 1, 1893, and between March 1, 1893, and January 1, 1896; and also what was the amount of notes of such banks redeemed by the Treasury during each of these periods?

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask if the resolution is admissible of amendment. I would like to offer an amendment, which is perfectly harmless, and I think perhaps the gentleman would accept it. Is the resolution open to amendment, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The resolution is open to amendment.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I have not a copy of the resolution, and can not, therefore, indicate exactly to what line I would like to offer the amendment. I would like to amend the resolution so as to have the Secretary of the Treasury inform the House how bonds were sold between 1873 and 1879; whether they were sold to individuals or to syndicates, or to banks, and to give the names of the purchasers and the manner in which the bonds were sold, as well as the amounts realized.

Mr. DALZELL. That is not germane to the resolution at all, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I do not see why it is not germane.

Mr. DALZELL. That is a matter not necessary to go to the Secretary of the Treasury for at all. I demand the previous question.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I do not think the gentleman can take me off the floor to demand the previous question. The Chair had recognized me to offer an amendment. I believe I was recognized, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I would like a copy of the resolution, so as to let the House see whether my amendment is germane.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. WASHINGTON. If the Chair will indulge me for a moment I will do so. [After a pause.] With the permission of the Chair, I will read the amendment, as the Clerk might have some difficulty in locating where it is to go in, and then I will hand it to the Clerk. The amendment proposes to add after line 9 the following:

Provided also, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to inform the House to whom and in what manner bonds were disposed of which were sold between 1873 and 1879, giving the names of the purchasers and corporations to whom or through whom said bonds were sold.

Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman will pardon me, the information that is asked for by him from 1873 to 1879 is no part of the information sought by this resolution. The resolution does not contemplate obtaining any information as to the manner in which bonds were sold. It simply asks what amount has been sold, what amount has been realized from them, and what disposition has been made of the funds. That is entirely a different subject. If we were to inquire at all as to the bonds sold before 1879 we certainly ought to inquire for all, but there is no proposition to inquire as to the others.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I beg leave to differ from my distinguished friend, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, in regard to my amendment. As I gathered from the reading of this resolution, which has not been printed, which is not on our desks, and the scope of which it was impossible to get, except as we could catch from the reading in the midst of the confusion that has been prevailing this morning, this resolution seeks to obtain full information from the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to the sale of bonds, the amounts realized, and what has been done with the funds gathered from the sale of those bonds from 1873 up to the present time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am going to be perfectly candid with the House. It has been charged repeatedly, and from different sources, that this Administration pursued a new and unusual method, and a method perhaps in violation of law, in selling bonds of a recent issue to a syndicate. Now, I desire that this House shall be officially informed as to the manner in which the bonds sold between 1873 and 1879, which made the resumption of specie payment a possibility, were marketed, whether they were sold upon advertisement to individuals alone, and to the people of the country at large in the form of a popular loan, or whether the bonds were sold to a syndicate in a manner similar to that pursued in the sale of bonds which this Administration found it necessary to adopt on a recent occasion when the credit of this country was trembling in the balance.

Now, I can not see why my friends upon the other side upon the Ways and Means Committee can have the least objection to have the request for this information included in this resolution, as it is altogether on the same matter as that contained in the resolution. It is begging the question to say that it is not germane, when that lengthy resolution covers the whole ground of bond issues. This simply asks for another branch of the same information, very valuable to the House and to the country, and I hope that my amendment will have the support of not only our friends on this side, but all of those on the other side of this House who wish to see the light turned on all the financial transactions of the Government from 1873 to this hour.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad now to support the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee if the House or if Congress would authorize the reprint of the document, the general publication of which was once suppressed by a Democratic chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, giving the entire history of the sale of bonds to support the resumption of specie payments from the 1st day of January, 1879.

I presume the gentleman does not want the information, or else he is not well advised as to the history of that historic event. That was an event in the history of American financiering when the Democratic party proclaimed that the resumption of specie payments was impossible, and we were told that it would require the presence of the Regular Army around the subtreasury in New York to protect the little amount of money that would be on hand on the day fixed for resumption. But while we listened with intense anxiety for the reports that should come on that memorable day, the result was that there was more gold and silver in the Treasury at sundown on that day than there was at sunrise on that day. I know nothing about any sale of bonds between 1873 and 1879 except to protect the gold reserve, as we might say, in favor of the resumption of specie payments.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Is it not a fact that at the time when, as the gentleman says, there was more gold in the Treasury at sundown than there was at sunrise, the Government was in receipt of ample revenues to meet all demands upon it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly. There was a protective tariff in operation, and money was pouring into the Treasury. But as to that bond sale about which the gentleman from Tennessee inquires, that sale was an open book, and if the gentleman will only procure the publication of that document—it was a Senate document, quite a large one; I have it, and it is one of the most interesting in the financial history of the United States during our time—if the gentleman will procure the republication of that document, he will discover that the bonds were sold under a written contract with the same syndicate that bought the bonds of the United States a year ago at 104, and that that written contract had two or three provisions in it which do not appear in the contract in 1895.

One provision was that the Secretary of the Treasury might put an end to the contract at any time when he thought he could do better, and in fact he did put an end to it before the time expired. Another provision was that for sixty days after the publication of that contract all the people of the United States should have an opportunity to bid for those bonds at the same price at which the syndicate was to get them. Not only that, but they were to have time to pay for them in four several installments. Not only that, but the expense of advertising in all the leading papers, the advertisements to be drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury, was to be borne by the syndicate, and the gentleman will learn that those advertisements were drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury and were published throughout the United States at great expense to the syndicate, and that the syndicate was allowed to have only such bonds as the popular subscription did not take. And he will learn another fact of importance, and one that I am sure he does not want to know just now, viz, that the total profit to the syndicate was not $10,000,000, as it was in 1895, but was one-fourth of 1 per cent and no more, being so limited by the terms of the contract itself. That was the financiering of 1879, and that was the proudest act of the Republican party in all the history of resumption, and I do not think the gentleman from Tennessee really wants at this time to put that act on exhibition, in comparison, side by side, with the blundering, terrible downfall of the present Administration in its efforts to protect the finances of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. What was the premium paid under that contract of which the gentleman speaks?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The bonds were sold at par.

Mr. MCMILLIN. At par? Then less was obtained for them than was obtained for the bonds sold in the manner of which you are complaining.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Less was obtained. We lived then at a time when gold had been at a premium of almost 50 per cent and we were struggling on against the opposition of the Democratic party, the same party that to-day is attacking its own Administration in the interest of the prostration of the credit of the Government. We were then trying to get a gold equivalent for the greenback currency of the country, and we were being contended with and fought at every step by the solid vote of the Democratic party on this floor, and therefore it was that the achievement was all the greater and all the more glorious, because we had to overcome not only the actual financial condition, but the opposition of a party just emerging from defeat in other matters and seeking vengeance here.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, so far as the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON] is concerned, I would see no objection at all to it if it were in the form of a separate resolution of inquiry addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury. My objection to it is that it is not germane to the subject-matter of the pending resolution, but relates to an entirely different subject. If the gentleman will introduce an independent resolution asking for the information he desires, so far as I am concerned, I shall help him to pass it.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will my colleague on the committee state why, if we are to have this information at all, pertaining to the same general subject, it should not be embodied in this same resolution?

Mr. DALZELL. The point is that it does not relate to the same subject. It is entirely outside of the subject of this resolution as considered in the committee, and as I was instructed to report it. For that reason I am opposed to the resolution of the gentleman from Tennessee as an amendment, and I hope that it will be voted down. I renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I have had some conference with other members of the committee besides the gentleman from Pennsylvania. My amendment is pending, and I am utterly at a loss to see why the gentleman should so strongly object to an amendment like this, which reaches all the sales of bonds of the Government from 1873 up to this time, being made a part of the pending resolution. It is certainly, in my judgment, germane. It is very pleasant, of course——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON] inform the Chair whether his amendment, his original amendment, was presented to the House?

Mr. WASHINGTON. Yes, sir; I presented it to the House and read it myself. I now ask the Clerk to read it so that the House may understand it.

The SPEAKER. Is this a second amendment?

Mr. WASHINGTON. No, sir; it is the same; I have simply written it out so that it may be more intelligible and have also, at the suggestion of my friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], made a change of one or two words, which I ask may be incorporated; or, if there is any objection to that, I will ask that the amendment stand as I offered it.

The SPEAKER. The trouble is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has asked for the previous question.

Mr. WASHINGTON. But my amendment, Mr. Speaker, was pending before he asked for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. It must have been the previous amendment.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Well, then, let it be the previous amendment just as I offered it, though the one I have offered does not differ materially.

The SPEAKER. The question, of course, is on ordering the previous question.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Does that cut off my amendment?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I should be glad to have the amendment read. I have been endeavoring to ascertain what it is, but have been unable to find out.

The SPEAKER. That matter can come up after the House has decided whether it desires the previous question to be ordered. The question now before the House is on ordering the previous question.

The question being taken, the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the amendment presented by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON]. The Clerk will read the original amendment.

Insert in line 12, page 1, after "1896," the following:
"That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to notify the House how and in what manner the bonds were disposed of which were sold between 1873 and the present time, and all necessary facts as to the purchasers, whether persons or corporations, through which the bonds were placed."

Mr. WASHINGTON. Now, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The previous question having been ordered, the matter is not open to debate.

Mr. WASHINGTON. If the House will indulge me a moment——

The SPEAKER. The matter is not open to debate, the previous question having been ordered.

Mr. WASHINGTON. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he insists upon a vote on this amendment, or will he accept it as a modification of his resolution?

Mr. DALZELL. I do not accept it. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, it was rejected: there being—ayes 30, noes 94.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon agreeing to the original resolution.

Mr. PATTERSON. I hope the resolution will be read for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent. Is there objection to the reading of the resolution?

Mr. DALZELL. The reading will consume a great deal of time—probably ten minutes.

Mr. PATTERSON. I was not on the floor when the resolution was read before.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the reading of the resolution?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I object.

The question being taken, the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. DALZELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. NEWLANDS addressed the Chair.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] claim the floor?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HULL in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5161) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate on this bill was exhausted on Saturday last. The Committee of the Whole will now proceed to consider the bill under the five-minute rule. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Office of the Secretary: For compensation of Secretary of Agriculture, $8,000; Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, $4,500; Chief Clerk, who shall be superintendent of the Department buildings, $2,500; private secretary to the Secretary of Agriculture, $2,000; stenographer to the Secretary of Agriculture, $1,400; private secretary to the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, $1,600; one librarian, $1,800; one assistant librarian, $1,400; one appointment clerk, $2,200; one chief of Supply Division, $2,000; one telegraph and telephone operator, $1,200; one clerk class 4, $1,800; three clerks class 3, $4,800; four clerks class 2, $5,600; ten clerks class 1, $12,000; ten clerks at $1,000 each, $10,000; six clerks at $840 each, $5,040; one engineer, who shall be captain of the watch, $1,600; one fireman, who shall be steam fitter, $900; one assistant fireman, $720; one assistant fireman, $600; four night watchmen at $720 each, $2,880; messengers, laborers, mechanics, day watchmen, and charwomen, $20,000; in all, $94,540.

Division of Accounts and Disbursements: Chief of division and disbursing clerk, $2,500; one assistant chief of division, $2,000; one cashier, $1,800; two clerks class 3, $3,200; four clerks class 2, $5,600; one clerk class 1, $1,200; in all, $16,300.

Mr. BLUE. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee [Mr. WADSWORTH] some questions in regard to the reductions made by this bill. The report shows, I believe, that there has been something like $145,000 of reduction. First, I will ask, has there been any reduction of salaries?

Mr. WADSWORTH. In the first clause, the law clerk was struck out, for whom the amount estimated was $2,200. We also struck out one clerk of class 4, $1,800. This was done at the suggestion of the Department. I understand the gentleman is inquiring now in regard to the first clause of the bill.

Mr. BLUE. Are those the only reductions?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, sir; the only reductions in that clause.

Mr. BLUE. Have there been any increases in the salaries of officers in that clause?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, sir.

A MEMBER. Or in the number of officers?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, sir.

Mr. BLUE. At this point I should like to be informed by the chairman of the committee where the reductions occur.

Mr. WADSWORTH. You mean throughout the bill?

Mr. BLUE. Yes, sir; if the gentleman has the information conveniently at hand.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We can not hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. BLUE. I have asked the chairman of the committee where the reductions occur in this bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Do you mean in this item?

Mr. BLUE. Not only in this item, but through the entire bill, if the gentleman has a statement showing in detail where the reductions have been made.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I would suggest to the chairman that there has been an increase in the Animal Bureau; a chief clerk dropped and an assistant chief of division added at an increased salary; a man who does not know hollow horn from botts. [Laughter.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. In the Weather Bureau there has been a reduction of some $13,000 in salaries. That is the most important change in the matter of salaries in the bill. There are a number of minor changes, but these I can explain as we reach them in the different paragraphs of the bill. It will be more convenient to adopt that course than to make a general statement now.

Mr. BLUE. I would like to have a detailed statement of the reductions, if the chairman will be kind enough to furnish it, because this is a bill on which there should be no reductions except for evident reason. It carries a small amount and is for the benefit of a very large proportion of the population of the United States. The reductions, as far as I have been able to ascertain, would be wholly unnecessary; and I would be very glad to have the chairman have the statement prepared of the exact condition of the bill as it is now reported as soon as possible.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I should have to go all through the bill and take up each item for that purpose.

Mr. BLUE. I would be glad if the gentleman would state the principal items, then.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In the first section of the bill there is one law clerk stricken out——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the general debate has been closed, and the pending section, which has just been read, is all that is before the committee. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I ask, for information, if it is not the rule to read the entire paragraph through and then submit amendments to it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was just saying that if there is no objection, the chairman of the committee can make a statement covering the reductions in the bill, although the general debate has been closed. Otherwise it would have to be proceeded with by paragraphs.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I would prefer to explain the paragraphs as we reach them.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. PICKLER. I wish to ask whether the reductions in the Weather Service of which he speaks are recommended by the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They are recommended by the chief of the Bureau, and also by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. PICKLER. Are all of the reductions made in the bill recommended by the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. WADSWORTH. With the exception of a few small ones. In the main they were all recommended by him, but a few were made by the committee on our own responsibility. I ask for the reading of the bill.

Bureau of Publications: Chief of Bureau, $2,500; assistant chief of Bureau, $1,800; one editorial clerk, $1,600; one proof reader and indexer, $1,400; one clerk, $1,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, there is an amendment I wish to offer here to change the word "Bureau," in line 9, where it occurs the second time, to "Division," and also where it occurs in line 10. It is simply a typographical mistake in framing the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add in line 14, page 3, after the word "dollars," the words "in all, $8,300."

Mr. WADSWORTH. I accept that amendment. It was simply an error in not footing up the total of the paragraph.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Document section: One chief of section, $2,000; one foreman, $1,800; one chief folder, $1,200; one clerk class 1, $1,200; five copyists at $840 each, $4,200; seven folders at $600 each, $4,200; in all, $22,700.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move as an amendment, in line 21, to strike out "22,700," and insert "22,900." It was an error in footing up the total.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Division of Chemistry: One chemist, who shall be chief of division, $2,500; one assistant chemist, $1,800; one assistant chemist, $1,600; one clerk class 1, $1,200; employment of additional assistants in Division of Chemistry when necessary, $5,000; in all, $12,100.

Mr. LONG. I would like to inquire of the gentleman in charge of this bill if there is a reduction in the Division of Chemistry?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Under the title "employment of additional assistants in the Division of Chemistry when necessary" there is a reduction of $5,000. That was done for the reason that a great deal of the work done heretofore by the Chemistry Division is done now through the different scientific divisions. They all need laboratories, microscopes, and so on, and the reduction was made because we thought the work could be done just as satisfactorily through the other divisions with the materials they have at hand.

Mr. LONG. There is a reduction, then, of $5,000?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes. But this morning, after a conversation with the Secretary of Agriculture and with Mr. Dabney, the Assistant Secretary, I have agreed that I would consent to an increase of this item to $10,000, if the Senate would agree to it.

Mr. LONG. Why do you not make that motion now?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not wish to make it now because we have not the information. What I suggested was that if the Department can furnish satisfactory assurances to the Senate that would induce them to make this amount ten thousand, I would not object. If, on further presentation to the Senate, they shall agree to insert that amount I will concur.

Mr. LONG. That is, if the Senate increases it to ten thousand you will not object?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, sir.

Mr. PICKLER. Why not put it in now?

Mr. WADSWORTH. For the reason that I wish them to present their further facts to the Senate, on which they may induce the Senate to base the proposed action.

Mr. LONG. And you are willing for the increase?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; under the circumstances I have stated. When these facts were stated to me this morning by the Secretary and Assistant Secretary, I was alone, and though satisfactory to me, I alone had no right to authorize the insertion in the bill of such a proposition.

Mr. KEM. I should like to ask the gentleman to explain why there is any necessity for this increase? Why does the gentleman suspect that the Senate is going to ask to have it increased to $10,000?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Assistant Secretary Dabney wanted to present certain facts to the Senate and to ask for the increase. These facts he stated to me, and as I listened to him I was satisfied that the increase ought to be made; but there was no other member of the committee present, and I did not feel authorized to accept the amendment on my own responsibility.

Mr. LONG. Do you object now to an amendment increasing it to $10,000?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Personally, I have no objection, but I am the only member of the committee, so far as I know, who has considered the matter, and I do not feel authorized to accept the amendment on behalf of the committee.

Mr. CANNON. Considering the extraordinary increases that have been made in this Bureau—this Department that used to be a bureau—from time to time, in the last three or four years——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Do you mean the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; and the extraordinary statement from year to year of how much is being saved—that is, not expended—by the Secretary of Agriculture, how much better he is than Congress, and how economical he is, does my friend from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] view with approval a proposition to further increase this appropriation, even above the amount which the committee have recommended to the House?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have said that individually I was convinced that it ought to be done. But I was not willing to say that I would favor it on the floor of the House, because none of the other members of the committee had been consulted.

Mr. CANNON. If this increase of $5,000 is made, has my friend any assurance that it will not be just $5,000 more "saved," that this economical Secretary may proclaim to the country as a saving between this and the ides of November?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No amendment has been offered, and all this talk is out of order. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] only purposed to give the Democratic party a little slap in the face about the administration of that Department.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; I was reenforcing the vigorous language of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] touching the Secretary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And you were doing right.

Mr. CANNON. I could not give gentlemen on that side a monopoly of all that business. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. This matter was fully discussed with the Secretary of Agriculture, and it was with his consent and approval that this reduction was made.

Mr. LONG. Does the gentleman state that it was made at the suggestion of the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. The explanation was that this work that had formerly been done in this division was now being done in other divisions, and that this amount was all that was needed.

Mr. PICKLER. Is not the Secretary of Agriculture willing to wipe out the whole Department?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. We are not trying the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. PICKLER. I think he ought to be tried.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. He is running that Department on business principles, and when he says that he thinks a particular item can be reduced, and that the work is being done elsewhere, I fail to understand why we should increase that item here.

Mr. PICKLER. Simply because on his recommendations the whole Agricultural Department will go out of existence pretty soon.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I think the matter was well understood. The members of the subcommittee understood it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is there anything before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. If no amendment is offered, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk, resuming the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Division of Agrostology: One agrostologist, who shall be chief of division, $2,500; one assistant chief, $1,800; one assistant, $1,500; one assistant, $1,400; one histologist, $900; in all, $8,100.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I move to strike out the Division of Agrostology. I consider that a very important division, much more so than garden seeds.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] moves to strike out the paragraph just read.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, during the years that have passed over our heads, which involved the discussion of the Morrison tariff bill, the Mills bill, the bill of 1890, the law of 1894, and the attempted legislation of the present Congress to relieve the Treasury from bankruptcy, a great deal has been said about the effect of our legislation upon the agricultural interests of the country, and we were told, in language more eloquent than I can hope to use, that the great aim and purpose of the Democratic party on this floor and in the country was to enlarge the scope of our markets in foreign lands for the productions of our agricultural interests. We were told that we were, by the law of 1890, building around the agriculturists of this country a Chinese wall. I remember listening with intense interest to a splendid argument by a distinguished member of this House, now a distinguished member of the United States Senate, in which he argued from premises as follows:

If you buy abroad, you may sell abroad; but if you do not buy the commodities manufactured in foreign lands, you can not have a market for the agricultural products of your own land.

That is an argument as old as the discussion of this question, which is a hundred years and upward in this country; and yet it has always had to me a very interesting sound, and if we were driven to the discussion of theories, it seems to me this side of the Chamber, having the views that I do, would have difficulty in maintaining our position.

The time has come at last in this country when we have something besides theories to go on. We are no longer driven to the consideration of theoretical propositions, of discussions that emanate from distinguished doctrinaires of the colleges. They have become utterly valueless to the ear of the American voter, because the American voter has a lesson now based upon actual facts, based upon actual knowledge, based upon actual conditions, that answers conclusively all the theories and relegates into the obscurity which they deserve to occupy upon this question the men in the colleges, scientific men, who undertake to preach the doctrine of "the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man," as applied to the question of the sale of the agricultural products of one's country.

I hold in my hand, Mr. Chairman, a brief statement showing the effect upon the agricultural interests of this country in detail of the law of 1890, and the changes involved in the repeal of the law, the striking down of the section providing for reciprocity contained in the law known as the statute of 1890, the McKinley law, and I will add this statement to the remarks which I have here made:

HOSTILE TO THE FARMERS—ASTONISHING RESULTS OF THE WILSON TARIFF LAW—A DEFINITE COMPARISON OF ITS WORKINGS WITH THOSE OF THE M'KINLEY LAW IN A GIVEN PERIOD NOW POSSIBLE FOR THE FIRST TIME—A FALLING OFF OF $83,000,000 IN THE VALUE OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS EXPORTED, WHILE THE IMPORTS HAVE INCREASED LARGELY.

[By telegraph to the New York Tribune.]

WASHINGTON, February 14.

The great mass of citizens of the United States who are dependent on agriculture for a livelihood will perhaps be astonished to find to how great an extent the new tariff law is discriminating against them, both in the matter of the importation of their own products and the importation of foreign products which compete with their own labor. They have had intimations of this in the fragmentary statements which it has been possible to present from time to time of the workings of the new law, but it is now possible for the first time to compare definitely from official publications the workings of the new law in a given period with those of the McKinley law. And the statement thus obtained shows that in practically every department of agriculture the new law has placed the great population of this country who are dependent on agriculture at a great disadvantage.

The Treasury Department arranges its statements of the operations of the customs law in two different forms. At the close of the fiscal year, June 30, it presents a statement showing the amount and value of imports and exports during the twelve months ending at that date. At the close of the calendar year it presents a statement showing the imports and exports during the twelve months ending December 31. The operations of the McKinley law ended August 28, 1894; therefore, the last full year of its workings shown by any official statement in detail would be the year ending June 30, 1894, which is usually termed the "fiscal year 1894." The Wilson law went into effect August 28, 1894; therefore, the first full year's statement in detail which can be had of its operations is the calendar year 1895. Naturally, neither the old nor the new law worked normally during the few weeks preceding or following the date at which the change was made—August 28, 1894—and a comparison of the fiscal year ending a few weeks prior to that date with the calendar year beginning a few weeks after that date is essentially a fair one to both laws. Besides, it is the only method of comparing official statements of the workings of the two laws during periods of equal length nearest to the date at which the old law ceased to be operative and the new one went into effect. A comparison, therefore, of the imports and exports during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, with those of the calendar year beginning January 1, 1895, places side by side the two yearly official statements obtainable which most nearly touch on either side the date at which the change was made from the old to the new law.

MISLEADING DEMOCRATIC PROMISES.

A good many of the 30,000,000 of people who are dependent on agriculture in this country, and who recall the fervor with which the Democratic statesmen denounced the McKinley law as hostile to the farmer, and characterized the Wilson law as one which would be greatly to his advantage, will be surprised to learn that under the Wilson law the imports of farm products in competition with their own labor have been much greater than they were under the McKinley law, while the exports of farm products have fallen off since the repeal of the McKinley law. The orators who denounced the McKinley law and favored the Wilson law insisted that they were legislating in a way that would protect the farmer and yet increase his sales abroad. That their promises were misleading, inaccurate, and untrue is apparent from a comparison of the actual workings of the new law with those of the McKinley law.

In all the great articles of farm production, such as wheat, barley, wool, hides, tobacco, meats, flax, breadstuffs, hops, hay, hemp, cotton, and others, the importations have largely increased under the new law, while in the same class of articles the exportations under the new law have decreased. These statements, it should be remembered, are based on official figures furnished by the Treasury Department, covering the years most nearly touching the date at which the change was made from the McKinley law to the Wilson law. In the fiscal year ended June 30, 1894, the last fiscal year under the McKinley law, the exports of products of domestic agriculture amounted to $828,714,773. In the year 1895, the first calendar year under the Wilson law, the exports of products of domestic agriculture amounted to only $545,714,375. This was a falling off of $83,000,000 in the amount exported. That the new law actually discriminates against the farmer is shown by the fact that but 67 per cent of the total exports of 1895 under the new law were agricultural products, while over 72 per cent of the exports in the last year of the McKinley law were agricultural products.

THE OFFICIAL FIGURES.

The following tables show, from official reports of the Treasury Department, the imports and exports of farm products in the last fiscal year under the McKinley law compared with the first calendar year under the Wilson law. It may be worth while repeating the statement already made, that these two periods—the fiscal year ended June 30, 1894, and the calendar year beginning January 1, 1895—most nearly touch the date at which the change was made from the old to the new law of any annual periods covered by the official statements of the Treasury Department. The fiscal year 1894 closed two months before the end of the operations of the McKinley law, and the calendar year 1895 began four months after the Wilson law had begun its work. Each year's figures may, therefore, be assumed to present a fairly normal picture of the workings of the two laws, and thus to give for the first time since the enactment of the Wilson law an absolutely accurate official comparison of their operations as affecting the great class of citizens of the United States dependent on agriculture:

This statement shows conclusively that low tariff, tariff reduction, tariff for revenue without revenue, such as we have now, has barred the access of American agriculturists to the markets of other countries of the world; that instead of the contention of the doctrinaires being worked out by actual observations and by actual conditions, we find ourselves being gradually driven out of the market and narrowed down in the sale of our agricultural productions to the markets of our own country, and those markets circumscribed and cut down to the aggregate demands for agricultural products under the depreciation in value of the manufactured products of the country which are driven out of foreign markets, and hence the reduction and decrease in the expenditures of the American laboring man and consumer. This is all I desire to say. The demonstrations which I will embody in my remarks are official, coming from Democratic sources alone, and they will more than prove the truth of my proposition.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then do I understand that low tariff benefits the home market?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I say that it destroys the home market. I think you will find it plain when you read it.

The Clerk read down to and including line 24, page 6.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I reserve all points of order on the following paragraph—Salaries, Bureau of Animal Industry.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries, Bureau of Animal Industry: One Chief of Bureau, $4,000; one assistant chief of Bureau, $2,500; one chief of inspection division, $2,500; one assistant chief of inspection division, $1,800; one chief of dairy division, $2,500; one assistant chief of dairy division, $1,800; one chief of pathological division, $2,500; one assistant in pathological division, $1,400; one assistant in pathological division, $840; one chief of bio-chemic division, $2,500; two assistants in bio-chemic division, at $1,400 each, $2,800; one assistant in bio-chemic laboratory, $720; one chief of miscellaneous division, $2,250; one zoologist, $2,250; two veterinary inspectors, at $1,800 each, $3,600; two veterinary inspectors, at $1,400 each, $2,800; one assistant at veterinary experiment station, $1,000; one clerk, class 4, $1,800; one clerk, class 3, $1,600; one clerk, class 2, $1,400; five clerks, class 1, $6,000; seven clerks, at $1,000 each, $7,000; one clerk, at $840; two firemen, at $720 each, $1,440; four messengers, at $720 each, $2,880; two skilled laborers, at $660 each, $1,320; for employment of artists, laborers, and charwomen, $5,000; in all, $67,040.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I offer an amendment to that paragraph; but, first, Mr. Chairman, before my amendment is read, I desire to submit a point of order to the Chair. The act of Congress authorizing the establishment of this division distinctly states that the salary of the Chief of said Bureau shall be $3,000 per annum, and the Commissioner shall appoint a clerk for said Bureau with a salary of $1,500 per annum. The act of March 2, 1891, increased the salary of that clerk to $2,000. In this bill that clerk is dropped, and you have one assistant chief of Bureau, at an increased salary over that of the clerk of $500. Therefore this bill changes existing law, drops the chief clerk at $2,000, and puts in one assistant chief of the division at $2,500. There is no law, Mr. Chairman, for an assistant chief of the division; no law authorizing his appointment; no law authorizing his salary; and I must say, with all due deference to the chairman of the committee and the committee, there is no work for the assistant to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear the chairman of the committee on the point of order.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I refer the gentleman to the act of Congress establishing the Bureau.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I find that these salaries have heretofore all been paid out of a lump sum by the Secretary. He had absolute power to fix these salaries as he pleased. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The salary of chief clerk of the Bureau was fixed as provided in the law, and the officer that they propose to install here in his stead is not provided for. There has not been any provision for it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I repeat, for the information of the House, that in the last appropriation bill all these salaries were paid from the lump sum appropriated for the support of the Bureau, and a lump appropriation of $800,000 was provided, and the salaries of all the employees were regulated entirely by the Secretary and by the Chief of the Bureau.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, if the chairman of the committee will permit me, I suggest that all the laborers outside of those specified in the act were employed. They are not under specified salaries. He was given $800,000 for expenditures, and the law says that he shall not have more than 20 employees. He had 700 outside of the city last year and 50 inside, making 750 employed, when the law restricts him to 20. I will send the law up and have it read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. The Commissioner of Agriculture shall organize in his Department a Bureau of Animal Industry and shall appoint a chief thereof, who shall be a competent veterinary surgeon, whose duty it shall be to investigate and report upon the condition of the domestic animals of the United States, their protection and use, and also inquire into and report the causes of contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases among them, and the means for the prevention and cure of the same, and to collect such information on those subjects as shall be useful to the agricultural and commercial interests of the country, and the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to employ a force sufficient for this purpose, not to exceed 20 persons at any one time. The salary of the Chief of said Bureau shall be $3,000 per annum and the Commissioner shall appoint a clerk for said Bureau with a salary of $1,500 per annum.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, there are but two salaried officers provided for in that act, the chief and the clerk, both whose salaries are fixed, but by an act dated March 2, 1895, Congress increased the salary of the clerk to $2,000. There has been no assistant chief since 1893, but in January last, this year, the Secretary appointed a certain doctor in this town—an M.D., not a veterinary surgeon—as assistant chief of that division, a man who knows nothing in the world about veterinary surgery, although the act requires that this officer shall be a veterinary surgeon. There are several reasons why this provision is out of order. First, it changes existing law; second, it increases the appropriation, and third, it puts an officer in that division who is not competent in the face of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia if he has investigated this subject and if he is entirely certain that the act of 1884 has not been amended as to the number of employees that may be employed in this Bureau?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It has not. The same act of May 29, 1884, gave the Secretary of Agriculture a bulk sum of $800,000 without specifying a single officer that was to be employed or a single salary that was to be paid, the money being used to pay laborers and experts at the different stock yards and stock pens throughout the country. That $800,000 has been disbursed in that way, but the law recognizes only two officers of this Bureau and fixes their salaries.

Mr. DINGLEY. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, it can hardly be that that statute of 1884 has not been amended at some time with respect to the number of employees; for certainly 20, nor three times 20, nor five times 20 could not accomplish the work that this Bureau is set to do; but if the gentleman is correct as to that provision of the statute remaining unchanged, of course the point of order would be a good one against the Bureau having more than 20 employees.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I am not making a point against the Bureau having more than 20 employees.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, in this connection, I want to suggest that I am glad that the Committee on Agriculture has undertaken to appropriately determine in each appropriation bill the number of officials that there shall be in each of these bureaus of the Agricultural Department, just as is done with respect to every other Department of the Government, and to provide definitely for their salaries. There can be no more vicious method of making appropriations than appropriating a lump sum and giving full authority to the heads of Departments to determine not only the number of officials and others that shall be employed, but their salaries. I commend very heartily the wisdom of the Committee on Agriculture in endeavoring, so far as this Bureau is concerned, to put an end to that practice and to provide specifically what each official who is to be paid out of these appropriations shall receive.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Unfortunately the committee does not do that. They give him the $800,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, sir; we do not. We reduce the appropriation by more than the amount paid for salaries.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will refer the gentleman to the act approved March, 1891, page 44, where the Secretary is given authority to employ as many persons as he may deem necessary, including $1,000 temporary compensation to the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry. There is one amendment, and it is the only amendment that we have had to the act since its passage.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman does not hold that the law of 1884 is still applicable, confining this Bureau to 20 employees?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I have not made a point of order on that. I have merely suggested that the law authorized the employment of 20 persons, and that the Commissioner now has 750. I mention that fact to bring it to the attention of the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Well, the gentleman must know that the Bureau of Animal Industry is probably the most important Bureau of the Department, and I think the law of 1884 must have been amended, because the Bureau has been going on for several years with a large number of employees.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the gentleman will look at the act of 1895, he will find all the change that has ever been made. That act gives the Commissioner $800,000, to be spent as he pleases.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the question is on the point of order, and it is entirely to that that I wish to direct attention. The point of order is not that the Committee on Agriculture has classified the bulk appropriations hitherto made, and put it at the disposal of the Secretary of Agriculture, as the gentleman from Maine seems to think. The point of order is that this changes existing law, inasmuch as it abolishes a statutory office that, in the act of 1884, was created. In that act two statutory offices, and two only, were fixed—that is the act establishing the Bureau of Animal Industry. One officer of that Bureau was a clerk, whose salary was fixed at $1,500 per annum.

Now, there has never been any change of that statute establishing these statutory officers—and I ask the attention of my friend, the gentleman from Maine, because I do not believe that after he hears the grounds upon which the point of order is made, he will contend that it is not well taken—there has never been any change in the law to establish these statutory offices. There has been a change in a subsequent appropriation bill of the salary which these statutory officers were to receive.

Now, the point made is that here is an amendment which changes an existing law by abolishing a statutory office. It seems to me so clear that the abolition of a statutory office is a change of existing law that it is not worth while to argue it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But it does reduce expenditures.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No; it increases the expenditure $500 a year.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There are two answers to the suggestion of the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from New York. The first is, as I understand the rules of the present House, the limitation upon the point of order which may be made and which was made by the Democratic Houses—namely, that a point of order did not lie if the proposition reduced expenditures—is not a limitation under the present rules of the House. The second answer is one of fact, that it does not reduce the expenditures, because it provides, instead of the officer abolished, another officer with an increase of salary of two hundred and twenty or two hundred and fifty dollars per annum.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that the gentleman's charge is entirely wrong in one respect. He says that while we have been classifying the appropriations for this Bureau we have repealed the old appropriation for bulk sums and put them in the hands of the Secretary without any reduction. He is entirely mistaken in this. We have made a considerable saving in the total appropriations when we take everything into consideration. We have reduced the bulk appropriation from $800,000 to $650,000, I think.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is a reduction of $83,000 in that Bureau.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In that respect the gentleman from Maine is right. The work which the Agricultural Committee has done is a work worthy of all praise. There is nothing in the Government operations that I know of that seems to me to be more wrong in principle than the idea of leaving vast sums of money under the control and to be expended exclusively at the discretion of the executive officers of the Government.

But the point of order is not directed to that. The point of order is that there is a change of existing law, and the point of order is sustained by the assertion that the existing law embodies the establishment of a statutory office and that this changes that statutory office.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the point of order to be first to the whole of this paragraph with reference to the salary of the Chief of this Bureau?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No; only to that part of it dropping the chief clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That you are abolishing an office here by creating another one, namely, one assistant chief of division. My point of order is that you have no right to abolish the chief clerk, who is provided for by statutory law, and substitute an assistant chief of division in his stead.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, I offer the amendment I send up, so as to provide for the deficiency thus created.

Mr. BRODERICK. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. BRODERICK. Does the gentleman maintain that the point of order will lie to the simple omission to make an appropriation to pay a salary? This is not a proposition to abolish an office, it is not a proposition to change the law, but simply an omission to make an appropriation for a salary.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The Chair has already ruled on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands this to be the abolition of an office entirely and the creation of another with an increase of salary of $500.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, I ask that the amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1 of page 7, after the word "dollars," strike out "one assistant chief," and insert in lieu thereof "one chief clerk"; and in line 2 strike out "five hundred"; so that the clause will read "one chief clerk of Bureau, $2,000."

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That amendment puts back the officer as authorized by law and at the salary authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Georgia that as the words "two thousand five hundred" have been struck out on the point of order, it will be necessary to make the language of the amendment somewhat broader. The reason the Chair did not decide the point of order before was that he understood it was reserved, with the understanding that if the amendment were voted down the point should be insisted on.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then I offer the whole proposition.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I understand that the words "one assistant chief of Bureau at $2,500," in line 1, page 7, have been eliminated on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And now I move an independent amendment, to insert, after the word "dollars," the words "one chief clerk of Bureau at $2,000."

The Clerk read the amendment of Mr. LIVINGSTON.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. The Department does not need that officer, and so informed the subcommittee. Certainly this House does not want to force upon the Secretary of Agriculture, or any other Secretary, an officer that he does not need to transact the business of the Department.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. In answer to that remark, I wish to say that the present chief clerk has been serving since 1893 under the law. Prior to that, for eight years, a gentleman by the name of Cowing held the place of chief clerk. This officer is provided for by law; and the other officer whom the gentleman so generously inserted in the bill was not provided for by law. I will ask the gentleman whether there is any necessity for an assistant chief?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Why, the gentleman from Georgia knows himself that one chief of that division can not properly transact its business. As I have said, this is probably the most important Bureau of the whole Agricultural Department. It deals with millions and millions of dollars' worth of meat exports. This Bureau is, in my view, of more practical value to the agriculturists of the country than all the other bureaus of the Agricultural Department put together.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Does the gentleman know the present assistant?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have met him; that is all.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Does the gentleman know that he is nothing but an M. D.—a medical doctor?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not aware of that fact.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Does the gentleman know that he supervises the work of eight or ten scientific men?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No doubt he performs the duties devolving upon him as assistant.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture claim on this floor that it is suitable for such a man to supervise the work of those eight or ten scientific men?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman makes a statement in regard to the character of this officer. I know nothing——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Not a statement about his character.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I presume he is competent for the position, or he would not occupy it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. He is not a veterinary surgeon or a scientific man.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I doubt whether the gentleman is correctly informed on that point. I doubt whether the Secretary of Agriculture or Dr. Salmon, the Chief of the Bureau, would deliberately violate the law and employ a man not a veterinary surgeon.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I understood you thought differently the other day about the possibility of the Secretary violating the law when we were discussing his refusal to use the appropriation that the House had made.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is another matter. [Laughter.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is a gray horse of another color?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Entirely.

Mr. KEM. I wish to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will answer it if I can.

Mr. KEM. This is a matter of some importance, and I should like to ask the gentleman this question while it is in my mind: I understood him to say a moment ago that the Secretary of Agriculture had in his employ over 700 men of a certain class, while the law provided for the employment of but 20. Now, the chairman of the committee has just asked the gentleman from Georgia whether he supposed the Secretary of Agriculture would violate the law. I want to ask the gentleman whether, if that statement be true, the Secretary has not violated the law in that respect?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, the act of 1895, as I stated, gave the Secretary of Agriculture $800,000 in bulk, to be expended, I am sorry to say, just as he pleased, without any responsibility to anybody.

Mr. KEM. Does not the law specify that there shall not be more than 20 men employed at one time in that branch of his Department?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It does.

Mr. KEM. And if he has employed over 700 has he not violated the law?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is an inference which the gentleman can draw just as well as I can.

Mr. KEM. It seems to me it does not require any drawing of inferences. The fact stands out for itself.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman will bear in mind that we are dealing with an officer who is very strict in his construction of constitutional law and all that—so much so that he sometimes sets aside a statute of Congress.

Mr. KEM. But my point is that the chairman of the committee rose and asked whether it was to be supposed that the Secretary of Agriculture would violate the law——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to suggest to the chairman of the committee, in all good faith, that if we do not insert this provision for one chief clerk there will be no salary appropriated for this, an officer provided for by law—the chief clerk. As the provision for the assistant chief clerk has been ruled out on the point of order, the Department will be left in a dilemma unless the amendment I propose be adopted.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will guarantee that they will get along without it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. As they did under the eight-hundred-thousand-dollar appropriation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. A clerk will be detailed for this service, if necessary.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I again call the gentleman's attention to the fact that G. M. Brumbaugh, an M. D. of the city of Washington, a practicing physician, was taken from the ranks of the medical profession in this District, and without any knowledge of veterinary surgery, without any preparation for that line of work at all, was put in there in place of this law clerk provided for by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. My objection is simply this——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to submit any observations by way of criticism of the committee, inasmuch as I am not familiar with the duties of the office sought to be abolished or the duties of the proposed office. I do not know whether either office is essential. I do insist, however, that it is fair to presume that the office of chief clerk is necessary, because there is an express provision of the statute, as I understand it, creating the office. Mr. Chairman, it may be necessary, in the reorganization of this Bureau, to create the office just stricken out on the point of order raised by the gentleman from Georgia, but I submit that, under the rules of the House, the rule having been invoked, and this proposed office having been eliminated from the bill, that we should now execute the law authorizing a chief clerk for this Bureau. If that officer is not necessary, if there are no duties for him to perform, then, as an individual member on this floor, I shall not interpose a point of order if the chairman of the committee will now submit an amendment repealing the law creating the office. It seems to me clear, however, that Congress, when the original act was passed, thought this office a necessity. It has now an independent statutory position that perhaps gives it an importance that does not attach to some other positions in this same paragraph.

I submit, therefore, in equity and in fairness, that this officer's salary be provided for, or else the chairman of the committee should at this time submit a proposition to repeal the law creating the office. It seems to me that this is the analysis of the situation: If the office is not necessary—and I do not assume to speak on this question, because I have no information—then the statute should be repealed; but do not repeal it by indirection, because the rules absolutely forbid such action. I shall vote to repeal the law if the chairman submits the proper motion.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. The Chair has ruled very properly, doubtless, that this provision should be stricken out, upon the point of order raised by the gentleman from Georgia, who assured me only as recently as Saturday evening that no points of order would be raised on this bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Not against a farmer; that is what I said.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I trust this matter will be allowed to remain just as it is. This action was taken by the committee after full consultation with Dr. Salmon and with the honorable Secretary of Agriculture, and if there is any politics in the matter it has been injected by the Secretary of Agriculture. Both the chiefs of division and the Secretary say that they do not care for this official, and I know of no reason why we should insist.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then why not repeal the law?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I know of no reason why we should insist on retaining an official that neither the head of the Department nor the chief of division cares to retain. I hope the matter will be allowed to rest just as the Chair has left it, with this section stricken out, and I certainly hope that gentlemen on this side of the House will fully understand that if there is any politics in the matter it is injected by the other side of the House.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I should like to ask my friend one question before he takes his seat. Does he believe that the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Assistant Secretary, and the committee combined, have the right to repeal a law?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I am not discussing that issue.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is just what you propose.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I am not here to defend the honorable Secretary of Agriculture. I believe he is capable of taking care of himself. He has possibly been somewhat ungracious and hasty, but I want to say this: After a careful examination of the several divisions of the Department of Agriculture, I believe good and efficient work is being done in all of those departments, and it has been the effort of this committee in making appropriations to give them all the money they could efficiently use, not to mar the efficiency of any department, and we think in presenting this bill we have done so. The action taken here by the committee was taken entirely at the suggestion of the Secretary of Agriculture. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] rules it out upon a point of order, and I hope this side of the House will stand by the committee.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] has the floor.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. PICKLER. I want to ask a question for information, as to whether this clerk who is legislated out is named Mr. Lyle?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not know his name.

Mr. PICKLER. Does the gentleman from Georgia know as to that?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I believe the clerk's name is Lyle. I think he is a free-silver man. [Laughter.]

Mr. PICKLER. The question I want to ask is, whether the clerk who is legislated out was not put into the Agricultural Department upon the recommendation of the Senators from Missouri, and whether this arrangement to legislate him out has been gotten up by the Secretary of Agriculture since the debate on the resolution in the Senate a few days ago in regard to seeds? Has the gentleman any information in regard to that?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. We have no information except that the recommendation for this legislation was made long before the debate in the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. What is the question of the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. PICKLER. As to whether the clerk legislated out by this bill was not a clerk put into the Agricultural Department upon the recommendation of the Senators from Missouri?

Mr. WADSWORTH. On that point the committee have no information.

Mr. PICKLER. Wait until I finish my question. I ask further if this proposed legislation is not upon the recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture, and if it has not been made by him since the debate in the Senate a few days ago on the seed resolution?

Mr. WADSWORTH. To the second part of the gentleman's question I will say that this bill was framed at least ten days before the Senator from Missouri submitted his celebrated speech in which he attacked the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. PICKLER. Is it not further true that in the first estimate submitted by the Secretary of Agriculture this clerk was estimated for by name, and that he has changed that since the debate took place in the Senate?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That estimate was not made by name, but there was in the estimates an appropriation for a chief clerk, just as there were many other estimates that are not contained in the bill now.

Mr. PICKLER. Why did the Secretary make the change?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not the custodian of the Secretary's mind.

Mr. PICKLER. Is that not since the debate in the Senate took place?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would suggest if the gentleman from South Dakota should address his inquiry to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] he would be more apt to get information on the subject than by addressing his inquiry to the gentleman from New York. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, so far as concerns the interrogatory submitted by the gentleman from South Dakota, I will say it is true that when the estimates came from the Secretary of Agriculture they came there with an estimate for this office, and that subsequently, upon advice of the chief of the Bureau, that estimate was changed, in which advice the Secretary of Agriculture coincided. It is also true, as was said by the chairman of the committee, who never goes beyond the limits of the strictest truth in making any assertion, that the committee has no official knowledge of the state of facts mentioned by the gentleman from South Dakota; but it is a fact that this man whose office is being attempted to be abolished by this resubmission in an estimate from the Department of Agriculture is a free-silver Missouri Democrat. [Laughter.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is the trouble with him, too.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the House to a few facts bearing upon the question as to whether this office is necessary in the absence of another office, namely, that of assistant chief of Bureau, to take its place, which attempt fell before the point of order. No matter what may be said of the officer, the office is necessary to the administration of the business of the Department of Agriculture. If the Secretary of Agriculture wants to get rid of the man who is holding the office, let him, in God's name, discharge him. He has the full right to do it.

Mr. PICKLER. He is under the civil service, and he can not discharge him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, he can. The civil service does not keep a man from being discharged [laughter]; it keeps a man from being appointed. Let him discharge him, and let him meet the full responsibility of that position. As I understand, this gentleman is not making any sort of point about this. But my point is that if this office is abolished that it tends to cripple the administration of the Department, as the duties of the office are absolutely necessary for the proper administration of the affairs of that Department. The Secretary of Agriculture advises the abolition of the office, but he proposes another officer in the place of that one, and if he is appointed he will attend to precisely the same duties among others. Now, under a point of order the new officer can not take his place, but the duties remain and they must be attended to.

Now, if there is to be a lick struck at this man because of his indorsers, or because of his views, or because of what not, let this gentleman, the Secretary of Agriculture, who has never been cowardly and never hid himself behind anything, strike his blow from the open. I do not assert that such is his purpose. But if the objection lie to the officer, let him abolish the officer; if the objection lie to the office, will the business of the Bureau suffer? Now, let us see. This position of chief clerk of the Bureau of Animal Industry has existed for eight or ten years, held by Judge W. J. Cowing, now deceased, during the administrations of Secretary Rusk and Secretary Colman. Its duties are practical, statutory, and executive. Distribution of mail; that duty has not ceased. Distribution of publications of Bureau; that duty has not ceased. Keeping time and supervising work of clerks; that duty must be attended to. Examining requisitions and purchase of supplies; that is absolutely indispensable. This Bureau is comparatively similar to the Weather Bureau, which has a chief clerk, at a salary of $2,250. The Weather Bureau has no assistant chief of Bureau.

Now, with respect to the office attempted to be legislated into this bill. The duties of the assistant chief are not required except in the temporary absence of the chief, as his work is scientific, and the law requires him to be a veterinarian. Now, I am informed, and I do not stand sponsor for the information upon my own knowledge, because I have no personal knowledge in that respect, but I am informed that the man sought to be legislated into this place instead of the other man, and who would be required to have knowledge of veterinary science, is a man who has no veterinary knowledge whatever. I am informed that he is not a veterinary surgeon. I therefore beg gentlemen on both sides of the House, irrespective of party politics, to remember that the duties of this office are necessary; that the office is necessary, whether it be under that particular officer or not. There should be a provision in the bill for such an office.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have further time.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One other word, somewhat personally to myself. I was upon the subcommittee; I was upon the main committee; I followed in the lead of the gentleman from New York; and if anybody upon the committee is to be blamed for this part of the bill just as it appears here, I do not want to shirk my part of the blame, because at the time, with insufficient information of what I now believe to have been behind it, I stood where the gentleman from New York now stands, and therefore can have no possible criticism to make upon him.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Mississippi who, perhaps, rather leads the House to suppose that this was the only item estimated for that we threw out, I call his attention to the fact that we threw out a law clerk recommended by the Secretary, we threw out an electrician recommended by the Secretary, and we also threw out a clerk of class 4 estimated for.

Now, a word in answer to the gentleman from Missouri. When this Bureau was first organized there may have been need for a chief clerk, but that need has ceased, so the Secretary tells us and so the Chief of the Bureau tells us. Is it for this House to put a man in that Bureau against the judgment of the Secretary and the chief? I do not care who the man is or what his politics are, because that has nothing to do with the subject, in my judgment.

Mr. BRODERICK. Do I understand the gentleman from New York to say that this official has not any duties to perform there now?

Mr. WADSWORTH. His duties are so light that the Secretary and the Chief of the Bureau say that he can be dispensed with.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It occurs to me, Mr. Chairman, that if we do not adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia we shall be in this attitude: We shall have this clerk provided for by law, and as we do not abolish the office in this bill——

Mr. WADSWORTH. The best way to abolish an office is to take away the salary, is it not?

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is exactly the point I am coming to. The clerk goes along and discharges the duties of the office, although you do not provide his salary, and, as I understand it, the Government will still owe a salary and he can sue for it in the Court of Claims and recover.

The fact that you do not provide his salary does not abolish the office. The Government will owe him the salary at the end of the year, and it strikes me that we either ought to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia and continue this officer, with the salary, or else we ought to repeal the law. As suggested by the gentleman from Missouri, if the office is not needed in the Bureau I trust that no man here will make a point of order against an amendment to abolish it, for certainly no gentleman would desire to continue an officer in the employ of the Government who is not needed. On the other hand, if the object is indirectly to get rid of this chief clerk by providing an officer to be called an assistant chief of the Bureau, and, by a kind of juggle, to devolve upon him the duties of the chief clerk, it seems to me that that is an indirectness which Congress ought not to be guilty of. I think we ought to go ahead and legislate directly for the attainment of the end we have in view.

Mr. PICKLER. If the gentleman will pardon me, I understand that while that attempt is being made, as the gentleman says, yet the law as proposed here does not even devolve the duties of the former clerk upon this assistant chief.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman is correct in that. The language of the law does not, but I suppose it is intended that the Secretary of Agriculture may assign this assistant chief of the Bureau to discharge the duties of the chief clerk. Otherwise you will have the Bureau of Animal Industry without a clerk.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, the situation is simply this: The Secretary of Agriculture does not want the man, and we have provided him no salary. Now, do you not think the thing will last until next Congress?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. Chairman, I suppose the point of order must be sustained, but I hope the amendment will be adopted. I know, Mr. Chairman, that the duties of this Bureau of Animal Industry have grown to be among the most important in the Government, in the work that is done by it and the amount of money that is expended, and I hope that this House will not, by refusing to appropriate a salary for an officer that the law provides for, do anything that will cripple this very important Bureau. We know, Mr. Chairman, upon what small pretext the Governments of the Old World keep our meat products out of their markets, and we have to provide very carefully and guardedly for showing them that our meats have been properly inspected, or else they will make some pretext to exclude them. I know that for several years the Bureau of Animal Industry has been gradually growing, and while 20 employees, as suggested by the gentleman from Nebraska, were originally provided for, yet we all know that the great work of this Bureau can not be done now by 20 men. I suggest to the gentleman from Nebraska, also, that if the work of this Bureau had been confined to 20 men his constituents would now be howling as loudly as any people in this country.

Mr. KEM. I do not want the gentleman from Georgia to misapprehend my meaning in what I said a few moments ago. The point I wanted to bring out was, not that 20 men were sufficient to do this work, but that the Secretary of Agriculture was violating law in employing a greater number; that if more than 20 men were required, the law should be amended so as to permit him to have more; but the fact that he may need more than 20 men does not justify him in violating the law. There has been too much of that done in all branches of our Government, from the President down.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. Chairman, we have put this work upon the Secretary of Agriculture. The law failed to make provision for increasing the number of officers; and where he is not to blame we should not hold him responsible. This work must be done, and, Mr. Chairman, I hope this Committee of the Whole will not cut off one item of this bill. If we make any change, we should rather increase these appropriations from year to year, instead of striking anything out. I say this not because my section of the country is interested in the exportation of meats or other products, but because I think this measure is but justice to the Western farmers, who pay their pro rata part of the taxes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I ask for a vote on my amendment.

Mr. MOSES. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. LIVINGSTON, there were—ayes 31, noes 35.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, 44 voting in favor thereof; and Mr. LIVINGSTON and Mr. WADSWORTH were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 50.

So the amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Collecting agricultural statistics, Division of Statistics: Collecting domestic and foreign agricultural statistics, compiling, writing, and illustrating statistical matter for monthly, annual, and special reports; special investigations and compilations; subscriptions to and purchase of statistical publications containing data for permanent comparative records, maps and charts, stationery supplies, blanks, blankbooks, circulars, paper, envelopes, postal cards, postage stamps, freight and express charges, and necessary traveling expenses: Provided, That the monthly crop report issued on the 10th day of each month shall embrace a statement of the condition of the crops, by States, in the United States, with such explanations and comparisons with other months and years as may be useful for illustrating the above matter, and that it shall be submitted to and officially approved by the Secretary of Agriculture before being issued or published: Provided also, That $10,000 of the amount hereby appropriated, or so much thereof as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary, may be expended in continuing the investigations concerning the feasibility of extending the demands of foreign markets for the agricultural products of the United States, $110,000.

Mr. PICKLER. I move to amend by adding the following:

For the publication of the work known as the Special Report on Diseases of the Horse, to be distributed as such publications have heretofore been distributed, $30,000.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I raise a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. PICKLER. I hope the gentleman will reserve his point of order for a moment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will, if the point is understood to be pending.

Mr. PICKLER. Let it be regarded as pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order will be reserved.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take up time in discussing the gentleman's point of order. I sincerely hope, however, he will not press it, but will allow us to vote on this amendment. It provides for the publication of the book known as the Special Report on the Diseases of the Horse. As is well known, this is the most popular publication ever issued by the Agricultural Department. There is not a member of this House who is not interested in it; there is not a member whose constituency are not anxious to secure these books. This question has been discussed time and again, and on no occasion when a vote has been had here on this proposition has it been voted down. This is a book for which there is a constant demand from the farmer, from the carriage man, from the drayman, from the man interested in fine horses, and from the man interested in "scrub" horses. These books are in demand everywhere; we can not have too many of them. I assure gentlemen who have not yet had a great many publications for distribution that this proposition will give them the most valuable work that they will procure while they are in Congress. It is a book that will suit their constituencies. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw his point of order so that this amendment may be inserted in the bill. The amendment provides that these books shall be distributed as heretofore.

Mr. SWANSON. For how many copies of this book does your amendment provide?

Mr. PICKLER. The sum proposed to be appropriated is $30,000. I do not know exactly how many copies that sum ought to provide for. The chairman of the Committee on Printing [Mr. PERKINS] has information on this subject, which I am sure will be appreciated by the House, if he will be kind enough to state it.

Mr. PERKINS. I have information from the Public Printer that 75,000 copies will cost about $43,000.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Fifty-eight cents a copy was the estimate furnished us, I think.

Mr. PERKINS. About that sum.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman will remember that the Public Printer reported that the plates from which the old volumes had been printed were worn out, and that it would be necessary to make new electrotype plates.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. The plates were worn out?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; the old stereotype plates were entirely worn out.

Mr. PICKLER. That may be. But certainly with all these divisions of the Agricultural Bureau and the great expense of the investigations that all these Bureaus are making in all of the Departments, with the inquiries they are conducting, it certainly is a very mistaken notion, it seems to me, after having gone to that expense that we now stop short and not furnish the results of that information to the people. I have already said that this was a work of great importance to the people.

Suppose it does take new plates to reprint it? That only proves that the publication was so popular among the people that the present plates were used to such an extent as to wear them out.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Let me suggest to the gentleman from South Dakota that if the point of order is well taken against the amendment, he can provide for the publication of the work in the Agricultural Report. That will have the effect of increasing the number of copies, too, very largely.

Mr. PICKLER. That might be possible, and yet I presume the same point would lie there.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will state to the gentleman from South Dakota that if he desires to offer an amendment instructing the Secretary of Agriculture to insert this matter in the annual report for the next year, although it may change existing law, I will not object, and in that way he gets an edition of 500 copies, and will make the Agricultural Report at the same time of some value to the people. But to insert it in every bill that comes along I do not think right or proper.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Put it in the Agricultural Report.

Mr. PICKLER. I would be glad to hear from the chairman of the committee on that point.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will state to the gentleman that I will make no objection, and will be glad to accept an amendment of that kind.

But let me suggest to the gentleman that he propose the amendment, not at this point, but under the head of "Publications," on page 17, where it properly belongs.

Mr. PICKLER. That seems to be the desire of the committee, and I will try to conform to it. But at the same time I would like to say——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PICKLER. I should like to proceed for a little while longer, and move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hardly thinks that would be in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from South Dakota is now occupying the floor on a point of order, and would not be limited to five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. PICKLER. I am discussing the point of order. [Laughter.]

I want to say that I do not understand that the gentleman from Tennessee is to forget, or at all events I hope he will not forget, my resolution before his committee for a publication of a separate edition of this book. A great many people do not care to have it in with the Agricultural Report, while at the same time that will suit a great many.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw the amendment at this point?

Mr. PICKLER. No; I will not withdraw it. Let it go out on the point of order if it is insisted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have to sustain the point of order.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 9, after line 6, insert:

"And to secure, as far as may be, a change in the methods of supplying tobacco and other farm products to foreign countries"

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. CLARDY. It only seeks to place tobacco on the same footing and in the same category with all other products of the soil in foreign countries. It is now trammeled by exactions laid on it in a number of countries, and is excluded from some, and the only object of the amendment is that it shall be placed in the same category with other farm products as far as that may be possible and restored to similar conditions now existing with regard to them.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. CLARDY, it was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Biological survey, Division of Biological Survey: For biological investigations, including the geographic distribution and migrations of animals, birds, and plants, and for the promotion of economic ornithology and mammalogy, an investigation of the food habits of North American birds and mammals in relation to agriculture, horticulture, and forestry; for preparation and publication of reports thereon, and for illustrations, fieldwork, and traveling, and other expenses in the practical work of the Division, $17,500.

Mr. DOCKERY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in at the end of line 4.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 3 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, is hereby amended by striking therefrom the words "city of New York" where they occur and inserting in lieu thereof the words "city of St. Louis."

[Laughter.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. I make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. DOCKERY. Oh, I hope the gentleman will not do that. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk, resuming the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Laboratory, Department of Agriculture, Division of Chemistry: Chemical apparatus, chemicals, laboratory fixtures and supplies, repairs to engine and apparatus; gas and electric current, purchase of samples and necessary expenses in conducting special investigations, including necessary expenses, labor and expert work in such investigations, $4,000; for rent of laboratory building, $900; in all, $4,900.

To investigate the adulteration of foods, drugs, and liquors, when deemed by the Secretary of Agriculture advisable; employing such assistants, clerks, and other persons as the Secretary of Agriculture may consider necessary for the purpose named; preparing, illustrating, and publishing reports and exhibiting the results of such investigations, and to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to continue an investigation relative to the various typical soils of the United States to determine their chemical characteristics, and especially the nature of the nitrifying organisms contained therein; the preparation of reports thereon; apparatus and materials required in conducting such investigations; employment of the necessary investigators; freight and express charges, and necessary traveling expenses, $5,000; in all, for Division of Chemistry, $9,900.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Chairman, I wish to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill whether there is any reduction in this item from the appropriation of last year; and if so, the reason for it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The total amount submitted last year was $14,900, and the amount submitted this year was the same. We have reduced it $5,000, in view of the fact that investigations into adulterated food have, in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture, been abused in this, that a great many people having yeast and other articles of commerce for the market would come to the Agricultural Department and have them analyzed, and put them on the market as perfectly pure on the authority of the analysis of the Agricultural Department, and would use that as an advertising medium.

Mr. LONG. Then this reduction is at the suggestion of the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. LONG. What is the total reduction in the Division of Chemistry in this section and in the former section?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The total reduction in this section is $5,000.

Mr. LONG. And in the preceding section, covering salaries, the reduction is also $5,000?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not statutory salaries, but for extra employees, to be employed when necessary.

Mr. LONG. The total reduction is $10,000?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. LONG. I believe the gentleman is willing that $5,000 shall be added to the other section?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. LONG. That is, if the Senate will place that amendment on the bill the gentleman will not oppose it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is correct; but I could not consent to that amendment now, because I have not consulted any other members of the committee.

Mr. LONG. You are not in favor of the appropriation of an additional $5,000 on this section, I believe?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, sir.

Mr. LONG. And it is not the intention to ask for that?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; not on this section; but on the other.

Mr. LONG. What other divisions have you reduced from the appropriations of last year besides the Division of Chemistry?

Mr. WADSWORTH. We have reduced the Division of Botany and the Division of Roads. We have reduced the forestry investigation $5,000, for the reason that the sum of eight or ten thousand dollars has been spent each year in testing the strength of timber. These tests are practically finished, and there is no need of the larger sum. We have reduced the appropriation for experimental gardens and grounds $4,500, because experience in the last three or four years shows that this can be done. The appropriation for public road inquiries has been reduced by $2,000, for the reason that we have taken the printing formerly done under this appropriation and added it to the Division of Publication and Printing. We have reduced the Division of Agrostology, or rather they estimated $15,000, and we gave $10,000, for the reason that the $15,000 heretofore paid the salaries and the general expenses of the division. There were no statutory salaries in that division under the last bill, but the salaries are now made statutory and appropriation is made for their payment. A lump sum of $10,000 is appropriated for the general expenses of the division.

Mr. LONG. And these reductions have all been made with the consent or at the suggestion of the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. WADSWORTH. All but one.

Mr. LONG. Which one?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think in the Division of Botany he did not quite consent to that reduction. He thought it was a little too great.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In regard to the investigation of the strength of timber, what reduction has been made and under what subdivisions of the bill does that come?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Under the Division of Forestry. They have had an appropriation for general expenses of that division of $25,000. This bill carries $20,000.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. And it is cut down now to that?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The sum of eight or ten thousand dollars has been spent every year for several years in testing the strength of timber. Those tests are practically finished.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not think the investigations are finished so far as Western timbers are concerned, and there is a great desire expressed here that these experiments be continued until the Pacific Coast timber is thoroughly inspected.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Department informs the committee that practically these tests have been finished, and that, if not actually finished, there is enough money left in the appropriation of 1895 to complete them.

The Clerk, resuming the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Fiber investigations: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to continue the investigations relating to textile fibers indigenous in or adapted to the United States, including their economic growth, cleansing, and decorticating, preparatory to manufacture; the testing machines and processes for said cleansing and decorticating; for the purchase of material for said tests; for the purchase of fiber plants and seeds for distribution, propagation, and experiment, and for the labor and expenses incident thereto; and for traveling expenses in connection with said duties, $5,000.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 19, page 14, insert the following:
"And the Secretary of Agriculture shall use, in his discretion, such portion of said sum as he may deem advisable for the purchase of fiber flaxseed, to be distributed for use in the State of Washington."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Agricultural experiment stations, Office of Experiment Stations: To carry into effect the provisions of an act approved March 2, 1887, entitled "An act to establish agricultural experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto," and to enforce the execution thereof, $750,000, $30,000 of which sum shall be payable upon the order of the Secretary of Agriculture, to enable him to carry out the provisions of section 3 of the said act of March 2, 1887, and the Secretary of Agriculture shall prescribe the form of the annual financial statement required by section 3 of said act of March 2, 1887, shall ascertain whether the expenditures under the appropriation hereby made are in accordance with the provisions of the said act, and shall make report thereon to Congress; and the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to employ such assistants, clerks, and other persons as he may deem necessary, and to incur such other expenses for office fixtures and supplies, stationery, traveling, freight, and express charges, illustration and publication of the Experiment Station Record, bulletins, and reports as he may find essential in carrying out the objects of the above acts, and the sums apportioned to the several States shall be paid quarterly in advance. And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to furnish to such institutions or individuals as may care to buy it copies of the card index of agricultural literature prepared by the Office of Experiment Stations and charge for the same a price covering the additional expense involved in the preparation of these copies, and he is hereby authorized to apply the moneys received toward the expense of the preparation of the index, $750,000.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Chairman, I desire to propound an inquiry to the gentleman in charge of this bill. I find by examination of the bill at this point passed by the last Congress there was an appropriation of $15,000 for irrigation investigation. I desire to know whether anywhere in this bill, as reported by the committee, there is an appropriation for the continuation of that investigation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the item for the investigation of irrigation was stricken out from the bill for this reason: For a certain number of years the question of irrigation was an experiment in this country. The Department of Agriculture has gone as far as it possibly can in instructing the people living on the streams throughout the arid regions how to irrigate. From now on it is more the duty of the Geological Survey to take the matter up and ascertain the sources of water and the quantities of water from the watersheds, and we can depend upon that service to attend to the matter. The Secretary of Agriculture believes that his Department can render no further service to the people living along the streams of the far West in practical irrigation. I know it, as I am interested in irrigation to a limited extent myself.

Mr. LONG. I would like to inquire whether this provision was struck out at the suggestion of the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think he said that he could do without the appropriation.

Mr. LONG. I desire to offer an amendment at this point.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. I desire to make an inquiry as to what was done with the former appropriation, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, of $15,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is being used. There is $6,000 or $8,000 of it used in salaries at the Bureau in Washington.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. How was the rest of it used?

Mr. WADSWORTH. In certain investigations. I can not tell you in detail.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. Can not you give this committee some light on it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. On the 1st day of July, 1895, there was a balance unexpended of $2,160.42. On the 1st day of February, 1896—that is, up to date—there was an unexpended balance of $1,069.23.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. That, still, does not enlighten this committee as to what was done and what the appropriation was used for.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can not tell the gentleman. There are $6,000 or $7,000 paid in salaries of clerks of the Department. I think there was one chief clerk, and a chief of division at $2,500.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. Then I simply say that the condemnation of the administration and not the principle is involved.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That may be the gentleman's judgment.

Mr. KEM. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LONG. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the amendment be reported to the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after line 3, page 16, the following:
"Irrigation investigation: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to continue the collection of information as to the best modes of agriculture by irrigation, $15,000."

Mr. LONG. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is identical with the provision of the appropriation act for the present fiscal year. I am not here to indorse the methods employed by which this appropriation was expended by the present Secretary of Agriculture. It has done some good. I do not believe that the investigation of the proper course to pursue and what can be done by irrigation is completed. I believe it is possible to do something else in that direction. There is one gratifying thing about this, and that is that the appropriation now being made will be expended not entirely by the present Secretary of Agriculture. [Applause.] His successor will expend part of it, and I am in favor of inserting this provision for the continuation of the investigations. The report of the committee shows that there has been a decrease in the appropriations over the present fiscal year of $145,358, but their report also shows that this decrease is not in salaries, but that the salaries have been increased, as shown by their report, $61,180.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman does not want to mislead the committee I am sure.

Mr. LONG. I am taking your report.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is caused entirely by the classification of the salaries in the Bureau of Animal Industry, and making certain ones statutory.

Mr. LONG. That is a reclassification which requires a larger amount than was paid before.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We take this out of the lump sum for the Bureau of Animal Industry, and the actual saving in the Bureau of Animal Industry is $87,000.

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; this decrease of $145,318 is brought about in what way?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have named a number of the items to the gentleman.

Mr. LONG. It is brought about by the decrease of items just like this $15,000, throwing out entirely this provision of the bill, which was in the bill for this fiscal year. I am in favor of the continuation of this investigation. It has been of some benefit to the people that I represent, and I believe that if the Secretary of Agriculture will administer this provision in a proper way it will benefit largely the people of the Western portion of the United States. I am opposed to its being stricken from the bill.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas, and it is not fair to criticise the purposes of this amendment by saying that the Secretary of Agriculture has heretofore used these appropriations merely for the purpose of paying clerk hire in the city of Washington.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman misunderstood me. I did not say that. I said that a portion of it, $6,000 or $8,000, had been so used. I did not mean to cast any slur upon the use of the appropriation in that way.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. Well, I do not mean to cast any slur upon the committee; neither do I mean to cast any slur upon the administration, for it does not need it. [Laughter.] But I do venture to say that if $6,000 out of a total of $15,000 was used here in Washington for the payment of clerk hire, manifestly there was maladministration so far as that appropriation was concerned, though perhaps not any more than can be found in the Department generally.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say to this House that three-fifths of the United States is arid in character. The future granary of the world is to-day arid and desert in character. Irrigation is yet in its infancy. This appropriation has been made in the past, and it ought to be made now, and there ought to be and will be future appropriations to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to continue the investigations as to the best modes of promoting agriculture by irrigation. That is the object of making this appropriation, and it is no reason against it to say that the Geological Survey does this work. The Geological Survey is charged with the ascertainment of the supply and volume and flow of our rivers, but that work does not cover this point, because the Geological Survey does not investigate the question of irrigation as applied to the development of the agricultural resources of the arid regions. I insist, Mr. Chairman, in the interest of three-fifths of the area of the United States, which is yet to be the garden of the world, that we ought to have this small appropriation, and I insist that it is not proper to criticise our claim for it upon the ground that in the past the money appropriated for this purpose has not been properly applied. I trust that in the future it will be applied properly in the direction for which it was intended, and not for the purpose of paying some clerks here in the city of Washington for doing nothing.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I coincide with what has been said here by the two gentlemen who have just spoken, and I only wish this committee could realize the importance of even a small amount of work in this direction. The chairman of the Committee on Agriculture intimates that this irrigation work is about finished. I can not agree to that statement. In my section of the country, where we have the greatest artesian-well belt in the world, we want this appropriation continued. We say it ought to be larger, so that the Agricultural Department might send out practical irrigators, men who understand the distribution of the water over the fields, to instruct our people, because, even after the wells are put down, our farmers do not understand the proper distribution of the water.

It is a scientific matter. It is a kind of work which the Government ought to do, a kind of work which the Government does do in every other direction. The Government investigates as to minerals and mineral lands and informs the people as to where it will be profitable to mine; in commerce it assists by coast surveys, by warnings as to rocks and points of danger, and in many ways as to weather; adaptability of different sections for different purposes it investigates and reports in the interest of the people, and certainly it ought to do the same in this matter of irrigation.

I have no criticism to make upon the Secretary of Agriculture so far as this Bureau is concerned. I believe it has done a good work so far, and the only reason why it can be said that so large a proportion of the appropriation has been expended in paying clerks in Washington is that Congress has always refused to make an adequate appropriation for this work. It is only by agitating the question and keeping it before Congress that we have been able to get any appropriation for irrigation, and I want to say that it is going to be before Congress until something is done.

In the last appropriation bill we had the pitiful sum of $15,000—it ought to have been $150,000—and that seems to have been stricken out now at the suggestion of the Secretary. It ought to have been kept in the bill. I do not want to have it understood that I am finding fault with the committee or with the chairman of the committee that have had this bill in charge. I know very well the pressure that comes upon those who are responsible for the amount carried in these appropriation bills, and I know how necessary it is for them to refuse many things that are asked of them, but at the same time I believe some discernment ought to be used in making these appropriations. This bill certainly contains appropriations of much less importance than this one for irrigation. We make provision for agrostology and for botanical and entomological investigations, for investigations for the Division of Vegetable Physiology and Pathology, and matters of that kind.

Now, I say that while you are making appropriations in this direction, gentlemen, the interests of agriculture proper are overlooked, and in fact they are always the ones that suffer. You can always get money here to build a gunboat, you can get money here for the improvement of rivers and harbors, or for fortifications along the coast, or for building ships, but it seems that as soon as the farmers call for the publication of the horse book, or something with reference to cattle or sheep, or an appropriation like that which I am now advocating for scientific investigations along the lines that the people are demanding, the question of "economy" comes to the front and we are cut out of those appropriations. It is not right. The agricultural classes of this country pay more taxes and receive less return from the Federal Government than any other class in this country.

Here are matters for which there is an emphatic demand on the part of the people. All over the country they are asking why these appropriations are not made. Men write to us, "Why do you not send us these books?" One man writes to me, "I had a valuable horse that died the other day. If I had had this book I believe I could have saved him." Our constituents understand how these matters interest them. They understand how they are to be benefited by them.

In reference to this matter of irrigation, we want this appropriation to stand. The Secretary of Agriculture has sent out in this service scientific men who understand the distribution of these waters. After our people have gone to the expense of putting down wells—a work in which the Government ought to have helped them, and in which it must help them—they are entitled to have these investigations made. As the population of the country increases, as your cities become larger and larger, and concentrations of large populations therein, there will come a demand for more tillable land, for homes for these people who must leave the cities and find homes in the West. In these arid and semiarid regions of the country fine soils exist, none better anywhere; and the Government will have to take up these investigations so that those fine soils may be utilized. It ought not to take the back track on such a question. In my own State we have artesian wells that throw up water as high as 60 to 70 feet, and as high as 4,000 gallons per minute, and it must make our rich country a garden spot, and we want the Government to do its duty by our people.

These investigations, the expense of which is comparatively small, should be continued. This is only what the Government has done in other directions. It should instruct our people upon the distribution of these waters, so that they may realize beneficial results from the money they have expended. I hope the amendment will be sustained.

The chairman of the committee says that this is legitimately the work of the geological department. Sir, that is no answer. That department has been moving out on these lines; but I desire that this matter shall receive the attention of both branches of the Government. It is an agricultural matter, and appropriations for this purpose should be contained in the Agricultural appropriation bill. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. ANDREWS. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee whether a report has been made by the Department with reference to the expenditure of this money appropriated for the present fiscal year; and whether any specific statement has been made as to the results of these investigations?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have not such a report; nor has it been furnished to the committee.

Mr. ANDREWS. The committee does not know anything about what has been done with the money?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not in detail.

Mr. ANDREWS. I understand the chairman of the committee to say that something like six or eight thousand dollars of this sum of $15,000 has been expended for clerk hire. Is that correct?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is.

Mr. ANDREWS. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WILLIAMS. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment, in justice, as I believe, to the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. ANDREWS. I wish to inform the gentleman that I am not seeking to cast any reflection upon the Secretary of Agriculture or anybody else.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely wanted to correct——

Mr. ANDREWS. I am trying to ascertain the practical results which have been realized from the expenditure of this money, and I claim the right to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS] declines to be interrupted.

Mr. ANDREWS. I simply wish to say that for a large portion of the country lying to the west no more valuable appropriations can be made than those which seek to promote an extensive development of feasible modes of irrigation. While I shall support this amendment, I believe that the amount specified should be much larger than $15,000. I believe active measures should be pursued for the development of this question in its relations to the millions of acres of territory to the west that could be brought under profitable cultivation by irrigation.

Those who have led the westward march of civilization in this country have waged a brilliant warfare against the adversities and hardships incident to frontier life. Their successes have enriched the nation with untold millions that would have remained undeveloped had it not been for their deeds of patient toil and sacrifice. It is not unreasonable, therefore, to ask the Federal Government to assist in the discovery of ways and means whereby large portions of arid and semiarid districts of the West may be transformed into gardens and fields of plenty.

A certain gentleman sitting at my left shakes his head and says, "No, no; we already know all there is to be known on this subject of irrigation." Well, perhaps he does, but I assume that he will not be seriously offended when I call his attention to the fact, that the crowned heads and literati of the Old World talked likewise when Columbus declared that the earth is round and that by sailing westward land could be found. In spite of the self-assumed wisdom of that age, a new continent flashed into view, and time has established within its limits the greatest republic known to human history.

Numerous instances can be cited to show that neither the past nor the present holds a monopoly of knowledge. You ask Western members to vote for appropriations for coast defenses, rivers, and harbors, and we expect to do so within reasonable limits.

But, speaking for myself, I believe that the Federal Government should assist in the discovery and promotion of feasible modes of irrigation in the arid and semiarid portions of the West.

Give as liberal aid to the West in this direction as the West has always accorded to the East for the purposes mentioned, and western Kansas, and Nebraska, Colorado, Wyoming, and their neighboring States will return to the wealth of the nation more than a hundredfold for every dollar so invested by the Federal Government.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I entirely agree with all that has been said in favor of this amendment. We have in this bill a total appropriation approximating $3,000,000 for the Department of Agriculture, and we have an appropriation suggested of only $15,000 to cover the investigation of irrigating methods. Now, gentlemen, all know the extent of the arid region. It comprises one-third of the entire area of this country. It is the field of effort and of enterprise in the future. The great agricultural depression which has prevailed for some time past, bringing about the low prices of agricultural products has temporarily blocked the progress of irrigation in this country. But we are in hopes that the proper economical laws will be passed that will restore in part, at least, the values of agricultural products which have been lost in the past few years.

We all know that the increasing population of this country will demand that larger areas be put under cultivation. It is comparatively easy to cultivate land that is watered from the heavens; it is difficult to cultivate arid land, which must be watered by scientific methods, involving large expenditures of money, expensive surveys of lands and of sources of water supply, requiring, too, the storage of water, the construction of dams, and the diverting of ditches and canals. Even if this work of practical irrigation does not proceed now with the vigor that it should, it is important that we lay up a storehouse of information upon this subject while this great work is temporarily delayed. It is important that the Department of the Government having control of the agricultural investigations of the country and expending in a given year $3,000,000 should expend a part, at least, of that sum in attention to the needs of this vast area, which is hereafter to be a thickly populated portion of the country.

For my own part, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this appropriation ought to be increased. But at all events the present organization that has investigated this subject should be permitted to continue in the same direction. I am very well aware of the necessity which exists for economy in expenditures for the coming fiscal year, we all know that the revenues of the Government will not permit of any extravagent expenditures, and we all know the difficulties that beset the different Appropriation Committees of the House in securing necessary revenues that they may appropriate properly for the expenses of the Government. But at the same time, when we are making an appropriation covering a general subject, of about $3,000,000, an organization costing only $15,000 per annum, and whose objects are so far-reaching and important, should certainly be maintained as the nucleus of a larger and more efficient organization in the future. [Applause.]

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, I agree with what has been said on this question of the importance of the subject of irrigation in the Western country, but it seems to me that Congress has never undertaken to do quite the practical thing in reference to it. Irrigation is not an experiment. It has been practiced for centuries in some countries. It is not experiments that we want. We have had small appropriations several years, but have had no practical results from expenditures. We want an appropriation; and it seems to me that Congress will certainly authorize it and appoint some official whose duty it shall be to secure sites for reservoirs and rights of way for distributing ditches in the semiarid region and the arid regions of the country.

Everyone who has given any thought to the question understands that there can be irrigation where water can be obtained if there is a sufficient expenditure of money; and the thing to do is to authorize some official of the Government to secure the sites for reservoirs where the water may be stored, and secure the rights of way for distributing ditches, and get to work in a practical way. I repeat that that is what ought to be done.

I am not opposed in any sense of the word to this proposition, because there is a very large district of country west of us which must depend upon irrigation. Irrigation has done much for the State that I have the honor in part to represent here. The western part of Kansas needs irrigation; and the State herself has made appropriations and is taking steps to irrigate there, and is doing much to reclaim that semiarid country. While I favor this proposition, I fear that the appropriation will probably result, just as all the other appropriations heretofore made by Congress have resulted, in being paid out largely as salaries without any practical advantage to the people. If there is any report of what has been done under provisions similar to the one proposed no one has produced it. In view of what has been done, I think the thing to do is to authorize an expert to investigate and report and give us something that will result in good to the country and to the advancement of the important work that is proposed to be done. [Applause.]

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word concerning the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture that we know all about irrigation. I must deny the gentleman's proposition. I say that we know nothing, practically, of irrigation yet in this country. When the gentleman says that he, with ten years' experience in practical irrigation, has learned all of it, he shows to this House that he knows nothing whatever about the subject.

The people of Utah have been studying the practical question of irrigation for fifty years, and they do not know it all. There are many things which the Government can investigate and which the Government should investigate; how much water should be used on land of a given kind, how much water should be applied to a given crop, how much water should be used at different periods of the year. These things are not known and have not been investigated, and would be worth much to the agriculture of the arid and subarid regions to understand; and this appropriation, if properly used—the appropriation proposed by the pending amendment—should be used, in part at least, to obtain some knowledge on this very question.

I hope, therefore, the amendment will prevail. We have not reached the depth of knowledge here that the gentleman from New York seems to think we have on this subject.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Chairman, this amendment proposes an insignificant appropriation. It seeks to put into the bill what has been the law heretofore, for the purpose contemplated. It has been dropped from this bill upon the suggestion of the Secretary of Agriculture. I have been informed that he believes that the western portions of Kansas and his own State ought to be abandoned to the herdsmen and the cattle men. But the people who inhabit these regions have put into them their industry, capital, and energy. Such persons as they are can not be found in any other portion of this great Republic. Year after year in these semiarid regions they have remained by their farms and homesteads striving even against the laws of nature to test to the utmost of their ability the possibility of raising crops successfully there.

So far as irrigation is concerned in these regions, it is an unsolved problem. In the valleys of the great streams like the Arkansas there is no longer any question of the sufficiency of the underflow; but when you reach the higher altitudes in the western half of the State of Kansas, in that region not supplied by any great streams, the question there as to whether those people can successfully irrigate by sinking wells and raising the water to the surface is a very important one. It has been tested to a certain extent and has been in a degree successful, but it has been by the people themselves putting in their knowledge, their energy, and capital in sinking wells and building reservoirs to control the water and apply it to the soil. The Agricultural Department should join hands with the Geological Survey in assisting the people in solving this problem. The State of Kansas has contributed liberally to aid her citizens in experimenting with and testing the underflow.

All that is asked for in this small appropriation is that the Government shall experiment and give the people the necessary information. It is of the utmost consequence to all those people of that region that the Government shall determine for them where they can sink wells with a certainty of finding the underflow and save them the disastrous expense of testing for themselves.

The sites of the earliest civilization were in the irrigated regions of the world, and there are no more courageous, industrious, or patriotic people under the sun than those who cultivate the soil near the ditches of the great arid and semiarid regions of the West. Successful irrigation is one of the great problems of the future, and it is here for solution.

This bill, it has been stated, carries about $3,000,000. This limited appropriation of $15,000 is for the benefit not only of the agricultural classes of this nation, but for all the people, and it is to be used to reclaim these arid lands, not by absorbing a great appropriation from the Government, but asking that the Government experiment and point out where these wells may be successfully sunk and how this irrigation may be profitably practiced. When that is done the people will put into it their energy and their capital, a thousandfold in proportion to every dollar that is asked from the National Treasury. These men who have gone into the western third of Kansas and Nebraska, and have located homesteads there, are entitled to this recognition from the Government. The same is true of the heroic people who have gone into every arid region in the Republic.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to say that this is a matter about which appropriations have been made heretofore. These experiments have been pushed under the auspices of appropriations to the Agricultural Department. Now, here are the Representatives of a great section of the Union, representing, as they must, truthfully and properly, the particular interests of their section. They are not particularly interested in very many of the matters carried in this bill, in which other sections of the country are especially interested. Now, these gentlemen come here representing a great body, in acres, of the Union, a section of the Union to which we must look in the future for the great necessities of food products. These gentlemen seem to understand what they want. They seem to understand the necessity. Now, why should they be deprived? Why should this matter be cut out of this bill when they are protesting that it is indispensable to the development of their country? That is all I have to say.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to unnecessarily prolong the discussion, but representing a district which has been somewhat benefited by these experiments, I hardly think I should remain entirely silent until the discussion is closed. If we refuse to insert this amendment we should do it understandingly and deliberately, not with the idea that we have finished the work, but with the deliberate admission that we are not willing to commence it. We are just commencing. Gentlemen, are you aware that more than one-half of the people of the world live on account of irrigation? In Asia the great bulk of the crops are raised as the result of irrigation. Shall we remain behind the partly civilized or less civilized nations who inhabit China, India, and Arabia? Not only that, but a little investigation has developed the fact that we shall find in the reports published at the expense of the Government that there lived in America a race of men before the Indians came here, known as the mound builders, who practiced irrigation on an enormous scale, beyond anything that has been dreamed of here in Congress.

Now, the surveyors have great irrigation ditches on the western coast that were evidently dug by the mound builders, which could not have been built by the Indians. They have traced them for thousands of miles. Shall we, as proud progressive American citizens, be behind Asia? Shall we be behind the mound builders in having the sense to make proper use of these blessings which God has given us in the land which we have been given to occupy? The Indians were swept away because they did not make a proper use of the blessings which God placed within their reach. Must we be swept away on account of some little thing of that kind because we do not apply scientific methods to the means of obtaining a living for the people?

Why, my friends, in this Democratic House I have seen this appropriation made for four years without a question, without making a fight for it. Shall you signalize the return of the Republican party to power in this House by wiping out this little picayune item of $15,000, intended for the advancement of agriculture and civilization in America?

Mr. SHAW. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. COLSON. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order now. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SHAW] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the sum of $15,000 be also appropriated to make investigations in regard to the best methods of ditching and draining lowlands.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I make the point of order against that amendment that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York raises the point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina. Does the gentleman desire to say anything on the point of order?

Mr. SHAW. No; I think not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must hold that the point of order is well taken. It is new legislation entirely.

Mr. SKINNER. Mr. Chairman, it is pleasurable to me to see education in this country extending along Populistic lines, because for myself I can not conceive of a more paternal measure than the one we are now considering, and because——

Mr. ANDREWS. May I ask the gentleman a question? If the appropriation, as contemplated in this amendment is paternalism, what would you call the appropriation of millions of money to keep water off certain lands of the country, referring more particularly to river and harbor appropriations?

Mr. SKINNER. I will anticipate the gentleman's question and say this: That I propose to vote for these irrigation appropriations, and if I had the power I would make it ten times as large [applause], but at the same time I am inclined to draw no distinction between irrigation and ditching swamps and making canals for the purpose of clearing and cultivating our lowlands. You will excuse me for that, when I tell you that I am the representative upon this floor of the very cradle of this Government, and yet at the same time it is lowland country. It is the country of the Dismal Swamp, where the "fox fire" is seen strong as a lamp; and if we had some governmental aid extended to us we would have as prosperous a country as you possibly could have in the Northwest. At the same time, I shall favor your measure; and after you have had experience and profited by governmental aid in this way, I know that your hearts will be big enough to extend the same ratio of benefit to the lowlands of the country. [Laughter.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, speaking from memory a few minutes ago with respect to the salaries in the division I said they amounted to between $6,000 and $8,000. I find that they were $4,100, and I desire to correct my former statement.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe very thoroughly that irrigation has gone beyond the line of experiment. I reassert that I believe that the people out in the irrigated regions know more about the subject of irrigation than any gentleman who has spoken on the floor of the House. I believe it can be left with them, and that this appropriation would be absolutely useless and serve no good purpose.

Mr. PICKLER. Why does the gentleman say that?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the people there know more about this question than we do.

Mr. HARTMAN. I want to ask the Chairman first whether the amendment now pending is an amendment providing for the payment of $15,000 for the purpose of advancing the cause of irrigation?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. HARTMAN. Is that amendment subject to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. HARTMAN. Then I move to amend that amendment so that it will read: "Thirty thousand dollars, payable in silver dollars of 412½ grains of standard silver." [Laughter.]

Mr. DINGLEY. I raise the point of order on that.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Chairman, by a large vote this House announced the other day——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Maine reserves the point of order on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HARTMAN. Certainly. By a large vote the other day the House announced its opposition to standard silver dollars; and we were informed by a large number of the speakers that those dollars were worth only 50 cents on the dollar in gold. I am perfectly willing that instead of the $15,000 we should appropriate $30,000 in these 50-cent dollars. I hope the House will have no objection to inserting $30,000 in silver; and I trust they will be worth just as much in the opinion of the gentlemen who voted here against silver as $15,000 in gold. [Laughter.] I prefer it that way, and I am satisfied that gentlemen will accept that amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. PERKINS. But the House decided that it was opposed to 50-cent dollars.

Mr. HARTMAN. I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Public-road inquiries: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make inquiries in regard to the system of road management throughout the United States; to make investigations in regard to the best methods of road making; for labor, traveling, and other necessary expenses, and for preparing and publishing bulletins and reports on this subject for distribution, and to enable him to assist the agricultural colleges and experiment stations in disseminating information on this subject, $8,000.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I would like to have the gentleman in charge of this bill explain why, when the matter of good roads is in its infancy in this country, the appropriation is cut down $2,000?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from New Hampshire, I will say that heretofore the printing for that division has been paid from the sum appropriated under this head, but that the printing has now been transferred to the Publication Division. The money appropriated for the cause of good roads is, therefore, practically the same.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. That is all right, then.

The Clerk read as follows:

Publications, Department of Agriculture, Division of Publications: For the printing, illustration, publication, and distribution of bulletins and reports, $85,000, as follows: Farmers' bulletins, which shall be adapted to the interests of the people of different sections of the country, an equal proportion of two-thirds of which shall be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution among their constituents, $10,000: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture shall notify Senators and Representatives of the character and number of each bulletin and each other publication of the Department of Agriculture (not sent to the folding rooms of the Senate and House) to which each Senator and Representative may be entitled for distribution on the basis herein provided; for the distribution of bulletins, illustrations, and engravings; for the pay of artists, draftsman, engravers, and additional proof readers when necessary; the purchase of tools, instruments, paper, ink, pencils, paints, and other necessary materials; for labor, printing, printing proofs, necessary traveling expenses, and for drawings, engravings, lithographs, paintings, other illustrations, and electrotypes, $30,000; for distribution of documents; for the purchase of paper, envelopes, gum, twine, and other necessary materials, $5,000; in all, $85,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a correction in line 9, page 17. Insert the word "preparation" after the words "for the." That is to correct an omission in the printing. In line 23 of the same page, at the end of the line, the word "draftsman" should read "draftsmen."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendments will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. COLSON. Mr. Chairman, I now desire to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 11, page 17, after the word "dollars," insert the following: "Architectural Bureau, for the distribution of information as to the best methods and plans for the construction of farmhouses, the sum of $20,000."

Mr. WADSWORTH. I make the point of order that that is new legislation and increases expenses.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. COLSON. I do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will reserve the point of order if the gentleman wants to speak to his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman can discuss his amendment.

Mr. COLSON. Mr. Chairman, if there is one thing that has more firmly impressed itself upon my mind than all others it is the fact that the people living in the agricultural districts throughout the country need information as to the best plans and methods of constructing dwellings in which to live.

In passing through the rural districts in my travels throughout the United States, I have often observed large houses on which had been expended ample labor and material to construct comfortable dwellings when in fact, notwithstanding that large expenditure of labor and material, there was no comfort in those houses. If there is one thing more than all others that is enjoyable; if there is one thing more than all others that contributes to domestic comfort and happiness, it is a dwelling house constructed with all the modern conveniences. It is about as easy to have such a dwelling house in the country as it is in the city. This fact is not realized, however, by the people living in the rural districts.

The result of this lack of information is that the people are leaving the farm and going to the cities. This is unfortunate. The country population is the strength of the nation. It is in the country that you find patriotism that is not measured in dollars and cents. About one-half our people are engaged in agriculture, and this part of our population is the rockbed of our political and social fabric. We can not do too much for this class of our population. The point of order made by the gentleman may be well taken, and I understand that the Chairman of this committee may so hold, but I desire to put myself on record as favoring the distribution of the information contemplated by my amendment.

We appropriate money for the distribution of publications on various subjects and for the distribution of seeds, all of which is right and proper, and I think the Congress could do no better thing than make provision for the distribution throughout the country of information as to the best methods and plans for the construction of farmhouses. This Government ought to contribute in every possible way to improve the condition of the farmer. If it can give him any suggestion as to improved methods of building, heating, and providing water supply for his country house it ought to do so.

The pending bill carries $145,358 less than the Agricultural Department appropriation bill for last year. It carries only $3,158,192.

This is too little consideration for the farmers of the country. It is nothing, sir, compared to the contribution made by the farmers of the country to the support of the Government. We appropriate each year more than $25,000,000 for the support of the Army; about the same amount for the support of the Navy; and for the support of the whole Government the great sum of $433,000,000. Of this great sum we give only a little more than $3,000,000 for the Agricultural Department. How very liberal we are to the farmers of the country! Mr. Chairman, before this bill is reported I hope I will have an opportunity to speak further upon this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

The Chair must rule out the amendment as new legislation.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Page 18, line 8, after the word "dollars," add:
"Provided, That the work known as the Special Report on Diseases of the Horse shall be included in the publication of the Agricultural Report: Provided further, That said Agricultural Report shall not exceed the size of the same for the last fiscal year."

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I have put that amendment in the form in which it is at the suggestion of some gentlemen near me. I believe we each get about 900 copies of the Agricultural Report. This amendment would put the horse book into the Agricultural Report, but as some question has been made as to the size of the volume, at the suggestion of some gentlemen here I have provided in the amendment that the Agricultural Report with the horse book included, shall not exceed in size the Agricultural Report for the last fiscal year. I believe that amendment is feasible and I believe it is proper. I would a great deal prefer to have the horse book in a separate volume, but some gentlemen whom I have consulted seem to think that is not practicable at the present time. I believe that a good deal of the matter usually contained in the Agricultural Report can be omitted, and that it will be better for our constituents to have those matters omitted and this horse book inserted in lieu of them. I would be glad to hear from the chairman of the Committee on Printing and from other members of that committee on this subject.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I have on my desk and I exhibit to the House a copy of the Year Book, and also a copy of the Report on the Diseases of the Horse. The committee will observe that the two volumes are very nearly equal in size. The proposition of the gentleman from South Dakota is to insert this volume (the horse book) in this one (the Year Book), and yet to have the latter volume no larger than it is now; which is obviously impracticable.

Mr. PICKLER. Is that the Agricultural Report which the gentleman has there?

Mr. PERKINS, I have here the Agricultural Report.

Mr. PICKLER. For what year?

Mr. PERKINS. It is the Agricultural Report for the year 1894, the last one issued, and the Special Report on the Diseases of the Horse which I have here was issued in 1890. If you vote to insert this Special Report on Diseases of the Horse in this Agricultural Report, and at the same time provide that the latter shall be no larger than heretofore, then you simply provide for the printing of 500,000 copies of the horse book to the exclusion of the Year Book, and at an expense of $300,000. Now, the Year Book is intended to cover the whole agricultural field. It is supposed that all farmers and all who are interested in agriculture are interested in that volume, while for the horse book only those care who are interested in the horse; so that this amendment provides for a great extravagance. All that is required, at the most, is 75,000 copies of the Report on the Diseases of the Horse, which can be produced in a separate volume at 56 cents per copy, whereas provision is made for 500,000 copies of the Agricultural Report at an expense of $300,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the Agricultural Report is not required, then we have done a foolish thing here to-day in providing in the deficiency bill for an expenditure of $300,000 for the production of that report for 1895. On the other hand, if it is desirable, if it is a volume the publication and circulation of which ought to be continued, it ought not to be supplanted by this horse book merely to accommodate the desire of some gentlemen who want copies of the latter. We ought to proceed understandingly in this matter, and we can not carry out the provisions of this amendment without excluding the report of the Secretary of Agriculture for the year to which the law shall apply. Again, if both volumes are to be printed, if this horse book is to be included with the report of the Secretary of Agriculture, making two volumes in place of one, then we must make an appropriation of $600,000 in place of the $300,000 we have already appropriated.

Now, sir, in my judgment, it would be very much more economical, if this House desires an additional number of copies of the horse book, to make an appropriation of $43,000 for 75,000 copies of that book, and have them printed separately, instead of supplanting the Agricultural Report with the horse book, in which, as I have said, comparatively few persons are interested.

Mr. MOSES. I will ask the gentleman whether in his opinion if the horse book were included as a part of the Agricultural Report it would not be practically lost anyway? The recipients, if they do not read the Agricultural Report, would never know the horse book was included therein.

Mr. PERKINS. As to that, members desiring the horse book would find it in the Agricultural Report, and members would send the volume to their constituents as the Agricultural Report, whereas in fact it would be the horse book.

Mr. MOSES. But he would have to write a personal letter to every constituent.

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, no; the title could be amended so as to avoid that trouble.

Mr. PICKLER. I like very well what the chairman of the Committee on Printing [Mr. PERKINS] has said. I would much prefer to have this information in a separate volume, as undoubtedly every other member would. The Agricultural Report displayed here is a much smaller volume than those reports ordinarily are. They generally are about twice that size.

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, I think the gentleman is mistaken. If he will send out and get the Agricultural Reports for a series of years he will find that the size of the volumes is pretty nearly uniform.

Mr. PICKLER. All I have to say is that I get a much fuller and larger Agricultural Report than the gentleman from Iowa does, because I am persuaded that my report is usually twice the size of the volume he has exhibited. But I do not care to discuss that matter further.

It was upon the suggestion of a gentleman who has a good deal of technical knowledge as to the printing of these reports that the provision was inserted that the size of the volume should not be greater than heretofore. I shall be very glad to substitute for my amendment the proposition suggested by the chairman of the Committee on Printing. Of course we do not wish to interfere with the Agricultural Report, but this is a matter which has come up again and again, which has been fought off in one direction or another until the expiration of one term of Congress after another, so that we have not obtained the books. If the gentleman from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Printing, will again state his proposition I shall be very glad to offer it in lieu of my original amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. The Public Printer estimates that the cost of 75,000 volumes will be $42,350.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I shall be in favor of the amendment as stated by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. PICKLER. I modify my amendment so as to read as follows:

For publication of the work known as Special Report on Diseases of the Horse, to be distributed as heretofore under resolutions of Congress, $42,350.

The amendment of Mr. PICKLER as modified was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement, which I am aware is not in order, in reference to the amendment just disposed of. That amendment ought to provide in so many words the method of distributing the publication. It provides for distribution in the manner heretofore made, when in fact the distribution has not always been uniform.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] has been recognized and has sent an amendment to the desk.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment just adopted be modified so as to provide that 50,000 copies of these reports be for the use of the House and 25,000 for the Senate.

Mr. PICKLER and Mr. PERKINS. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be modified as suggested.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the amendment sent to the desk by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER].

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 10 and 11, page 17, strike out "eighty-five" and insert "sixty-five"; in line 16, same page, strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty"; so that the clause will read:
"For the printing, illustration, publication, and distribution of bulletins and reports, $65,000, as follows: Farmers' bulletins, which shall be adapted to the interests of the people of different sections of the country, an equal proportion of two-thirds of which shall be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution among their constituents, $30,000."

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire, Mr. Chairman, my purpose in offering this amendment is to call attention to the manner in which the money has heretofore been expended for farmers' bulletins and to show that the amount here proposed to be appropriated is unnecessarily large, in view of the practice of the Department heretofore. In Document No. 25 of this session, showing the expenditures of the Department of Agriculture, we find on page 37 that the entire amount expended for farmers' bulletins during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, was only $25,639.65. The appropriation for that year was $30,000; and under that appropriation about 22 or 23 farmers' bulletins were issued.

In the last appropriation bill, the bill for the year ending on the 30th of June next, $50,000 was appropriated as proposed here; but under that appropriation, up to the present date, there have been only seven or eight new bulletins issued. In the document which the Secretary of Agriculture sent to the Senate, known as Document No. 40, he states what he had done up to that date, December 18, 1895, with that appropriation. It appears by that report that he had expended in nearly half of the fiscal year—in nearly all of the six months ending on the 31st of December last, only $7,820.62. It is therefore evident that there is no necessity for so large an appropriation as is here proposed. The making of such an appropriation simply gives the Secretary of Agriculture an opportunity to claim, as he so volubly does, how much he has saved from year to year. The amount named in the bill will not be needed, and consequently I do not think we should appropriate so large a sum. We have already added some $40,000 to this clause, and it seems to me proper, as it is of no use, that we should take off the $20,000 I propose in the amendment, and I think that no one will object to the adoption of the amendment when these facts are taken into consideration.

Mr. CANNON. Had you not better cut it a little further?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Well, this is something, and it is something in the right direction.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, there is no increase in this item. The appropriation of last year was $67,000. In this bill we have done away with an item of $15,000 for illustrations, and added it to the $67,000, which would make $82,000; and we have taken $2,000 from the road inquiry, and added it to this, making $84,000. We have also taken some other small items from different divisions, making in all $85,000; so that it is an apparent increase only, but not an actual increase.

With that explanation, if the committee desires to cut it down $20,000, certainly the Committee on Agriculture will not make any objection.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The Chairman will readily assent when I show that the deduction comes entirely from the appropriation for farmers' bulletins, and does not touch the items to which he has referred, leaving $30,000 for that purpose; and as only $20,000 has been expended heretofore in any one year it would seem to be ample.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not object to the amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Division of Seeds, purchase and distribution of valuable seeds: For the purchase, propagation, and distribution, as required by law, of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, and expense of labor, transportation, paper, twine, gum, printing, postal cards, and all necessary material and repairs for putting up and distributing the same, and to be distributed in localities adapted to their culture, $130,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this provision, with reference to the distribution of seeds, be postponed until after we have concluded the remainder of the bill.

Mr. COUSINS. I object.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 20, on page 20, the words "as required by law."

I think that this is necessary in order to make the appropriation available. If these words are not omitted from the bill the Secretary of Agriculture will probably do as he has done heretofore on a similar occasion, where complaint has been made that he has not executed the law. He has taken, I understand, the opinion of the Attorney-General, who has said that under the provisions of the law now existing the Secretary may elect to say that he can not find any seed of the character proper to be distributed.

Now, if we strike out the words I have mentioned, here is an independent statute, an appropriation, and the purpose of the appropriation is specifically set out in the statute itself.

Mr. SKINNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk as a substitute for that offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend on page 20, after the word "dollars," in line 25, by adding the words: "And it is hereby made mandatory on the Secretary of Agriculture to make such purchase and distribution as was done in the years prior to 1895."

Mr. SKINNER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the language of section 527 of the Revised Statutes, as well as the former appropriation bill and this one, should be clear enough to be mandatory on the Secretary of Agriculture, but at the same time we find that the Secretary of Agriculture is so opposed to distributing this relief, or making available this appropriation, that he has even obtained from the law Department of the Government an opinion that the law is directory simply, and not mandatory, and he chooses to avail himself of that decision.

Now, I think the former action of the Secretary of Agriculture is sufficient to demonstrate that we should speak to him hereafter in a language that he can not misunderstand, in language commanding him to execute the will of the people. We should leave no room whatever for him to hinge a doubt upon about our will in connection with the matter.

The distribution of the seed by the Congressmen to their respective constituents in this country is a question of prescriptive right, both of the people and of the Congressmen themselves; and while it may entail additional labor on the Representatives to send out seed, yet it is a recognition, to the remotest district and hamlet of the country, of their constituents who receive the seed at their hands.

And, Mr. Chairman, permit me to say that outside of that matter, while I have no assault whatever to make on the Secretary of Agriculture, while I have no assault to make upon the bill, yet at the same time it does seem to me that the only assistance that the Secretary of Agriculture has been to the farming classes of the country is to conspire with Grover Cleveland and Mr. Carlisle for the purpose of bringing about such legislation, or by the execution of such financial projects, as to practically halve the price of all their products, and takes up his time in planting trees throughout the country or lecturing upon the rostrum upon what we commonly call the "gold-bug" side. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Agricultural Department of this country was intended to administer practical relief to the people, and I can not conceive any more available manner of making the distribution of this intelligence or of improving farming than by the proper distribution and improvement of seeds.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that the passage of either of these amendments, especially the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], would concede the position taken by the Secretary of Agriculture. If would, it strikes me, be an admission that what has heretofore been done was not required by law. If we strike out the words "required by law" that will concede the correctness of the position now taken by the Secretary of Agriculture. Therefore it would be taking a position which we upon this side—and I also think gentlemen upon the other side—do not wish to assume.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 20, page 20, after the word "distribution," the words "as required by law."

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending which was offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SKINNER].

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask to have it reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend on page 20, after the word "dollars," in line 25, by adding the words: "And it is hereby made mandatory upon the Secretary of Agriculture to make said purchase and distribution as was done in the years prior to 1895."

Mr. TRACEY. I offer a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The substitute of Mr. TRACEY was read, as follows:

And the Secretary shall purchase the seeds, bulbs, vines, cuttings, trees, shrubs, and plants, and distribute the same as herein directed, and not otherwise.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment simply because I think it makes the law more explicit. If that is adopted, there will be nothing to construe, and there will be no question about it. It will be a plain direction to the Secretary to execute the appropriation made by Congress for that purpose, an appropriation which, in my opinion, is as useful as any that is made for the entire Department of Agriculture.

The substitute of Mr. TRACEY was rejected.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina.

The substitute of Mr. SHAW was read, as follows:

In line 25, page 20, after the word "dollars," insert the following: "Which said sum shall be expended as provided for in this section, and the Secretary shall have no discretionary power not to purchase seeds, bulbs, trees, vines, cuttings, and plants, but shall purchase and distribute the same when it is possible to obtain them."

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Chairman, I represent one of the agricultural districts of North Carolina. The question of the distribution of seed is exceedingly important to my people. I am daily receiving letters from my constituents asking me to send them seeds. I have not time to answer the numerous letters which I have received. They come from people who pay their full pro rata of the taxes of this Government. They want these seeds, and most respectfully, representing the people of North Carolina, we ask that the Secretary of Agriculture be compelled to send the seeds out as required by law.

Mr. TALBERT. I desire to say a word or two right here as a farmer, and in the interest of the farmers of this great nation of ours. And I am not ashamed of the fact that I am a farmer, although there are very few in this House. I do not, however, claim to be such a great farmer as it is said my distinguished friend from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] told his people he was on one occasion when he was stumping his district for Congress. He said he was born between the plow handles. [Laughter.] I was not exactly born between the plow handles, Mr. Chairman, but I got there mighty soon afterwards, and stayed there a long time, too, after I did get there. [Laughter.]

I desire to say right here that I shall favor the amendment offered by my friend from North Carolina because of the simple fact that unless an amendment of that sort shall be passed by this House the Secretary of Agriculture will proceed to do as he has done this season, and will repudiate and nullify the law, instead of acting as he ought to act and obey it; and I for one am disposed to place him where he will be obliged to dance to the music. [Applause.]

Why, sir, to show you his audacity, after he abolished this department under the advice of the Attorney-General, he immediately took possession of the hall where the work had been done and made use of it for other purposes showing that it was his evident intention never again to have the seed department opened.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the farmers of our country deserve some consideration at the hands of this Congress and protection from such base usurpation and tyranny of Cabinet officers. And why do I say this? It is because they make that which feeds and clothes the world, and as a general thing a great many of them go nearly naked and half starved themselves from being discriminated against.

Mr. Chairman, the only way that a great many of them know they have a Government is by sometimes receiving a package of seeds or going to the post-office occasionally and getting a few documents. I think, sir, it is an outrage to allow a Cabinet officer to have the law so construed as to deprive this class of people of that small privilege, and right here and now this House should say to Mr. Morton, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther."

In 1888 the very last act of President Cleveland was to sign the bill giving to the farmers of the United States a Cabinet office. I must say that that was one good thing which he did, and I am glad to be able to say he did one good thing; but the worst thing he ever did for the people, especially for the farmers, was to put this fellow in there who has destroyed the usefulness of the Department to the people of the country. [Applause.]

It reminds me of the fable of the dovecote where they asked for a king, having a hawk as ruler, and he destroyed so many doves that they asked to have a new king, and a kite was given them; but he ate in one day more doves than the hawk did in many days. The Secretary has acted even worse than the kite. He has destroyed the usefulness of the whole Department to a certain extent. I say that some restrictions ought to be put upon him, so that he will follow the wishes of the people of the country. Now, why should the farmers have this consideration? Let me read from his own report. He says of the farmers:

> The same farmers have with part of their surplus products also fed all the urban population of the United States, poor and rich alike. Cereals, meats, vegetables, fruits, eggs, milk, butter, cheese, and poultry have been supplied the village and city markets of the United States in abundance. It is probably safe to say that more than 40,000,000 of American citizens not living on farms have been so furnished with all the necessities and luxuries known as products of the varied soil and climate of the States and Territories of the Union.

Now listen further to this:

> During the fiscal year 1895 the United States exported to foreign countries domestic commodities, merchandise, and products aggregating in value $793,000,000. The aggregate value of the agricultural products included in that sum was $553,215,317.
> Of the total exports, Europe received a valuation of $628,000,000, or 79 per cent of the whole.
> Thus American agriculture, after feeding itself and all the towns, villages, and cities of the United States, has also sold in the outside world's market more than $500,000,000 worth of products. So the farmers of the United States have furnished 69.68 per cent of value of all the exports from their country during the year 1895.

And now, after that very magnificent showing, he refuses this little pitiful sum of $130,000 to give them a few garden seeds, by his arbitrary ruling.

In the presence of these facts, in front of these figures, demonstrating that agriculture in this Republic has, during the year, fed itself, supplied all citizens of the Union engaged in other vocations, and then shipped abroad a surplus of over $500,000,000 worth of products, then are these not reasons for some consideration?

How is it that the 42 per cent of the population of the United States which feeds the other 58 per cent and then furnishes more than 69 per cent of all the exports of the whole people must in addition to that burden be deprived of even this small luxury of a few seeds for gardening purposes?

If 42 per cent of the citizens of the United States have fed and clothed these other 58 per cent, and then furnished the products for exporting $500,000,000 of money, how can you refuse to put in a mandatory clause here that will force that gentleman to do his duty whether he wishes to do it or not? You have got to put the harness on him and make him work. [Applause.]

Now, one word further. The farmer's wants seem to me to be ignored in this Hall and himself belittled. Every other industry has received protection at the hands of the Government, while the agriculturists have been left out to battle with climate, soil, and adverse circumstances. We should take care of that class in its adverse circumstances and let it come in and have a little consideration here.

Why, sir, the farmer has been alluded to here with a view of belittling him in various ways. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. OWENS]—I wish he was in his seat—said the other day, and I do not hardly know what he meant, speaking of a little bug as the farmers' little lieutenant, thereby throwing, apparently, discredit on them. He was comparing a gentleman at the other end of the Capitol, as I suppose, to a little bug which bore its burdens backward. He must have meant (and God forgive him for injecting such a remark) that species of bug which, when you strike up with him, you are not able to tell whether you have overtaken him or met him. [Laughter.] Be that as it may, I want to say to the gentleman that if he ever meets the gentleman referred to at the other end of the Capitol, whether it be in public or in private, on the stump or in the forum, he will know very well whether has met him or has overtaken him. He will find, if he meets him or overtakes him, that he will have his hands full. [Laughter.] And don't you forget it! [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I desire that this amendment shall be passed as an act of justice to the great producing element of this great country, and I shall give it my vote and hope it will be passed. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TALBERT. I just want to say a word, if the House will give me one or two minutes more.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to continue his remarks.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. TALBERT. I thank the gentleman and the committee for their indulgence, and will not detain them long by what I have to say.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GROSVENOR having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 1676) to change and fix the time for holding the district and circuit courts of the United States for the northern division of the eastern district of Tennessee.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee again resumed its session (Mr. HULL in the chair).

Mr. MCEWAN. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There are two amendments already pending.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask if there is no one here who will undertake to defend the Secretary of Agriculture. Among all these Republicans, Democrats, Populists, and Tillmanites, is there none so low as to speak for him? [Laughter and cries of "No!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute for the amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the question is now upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from North Carolina for an amendment offered by his colleague. That is correct, I believe. The amendment and the substitute are intended to reach the same result; that is, to put the distribution of this seed as it was in former years by the Secretary of Agriculture. Now, it occurs to me that the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SKINNER] is the proper amendment to adopt. The substitute of the other gentleman from North Carolina simply says that it shall not be discretionary in the Secretary of Agriculture, as I caught his amendment as read from the desk, to distribute this seed. Now, the Secretary of Agriculture, as I understand it, does not claim to make this distribution in the exercise of any discretion. He does not claim to put it upon his option or his discretion to distribute the seed, but he said that the law did not require him to distribute such seeds as were offered to him in the market, and that they were not such as would require him to make the distribution by law.

The section of the Revised Statutes providing for this distribution of seeds provides for the distribution of rare and valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, plants, etc. Now, when the Secretary advertised for that class of seeds, as I understand the matter, he submitted the question of the advertisement and the kind of seeds that were offered in response to the advertisement to the Department of Justice, and the Attorney-General decided that the seeds offered were not rare, not uncommon, not improved, and therefore the Secretary rejected all bids.

Mr. COX. When the Attorney-General decided that they were not rare seeds, was it a question of law or a question of fact that he was deciding? [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, the gentleman is a good lawyer, and he can answer that question for himself.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that the Attorney-General did not pass upon the quality of the seeds at all.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That may be true. I am only stating what the Secretary claimed, which was that the seeds did not come up to the requirements of the law, or did not meet the conditions set forth in the advertisements that he had published. That being true, it seems to me that the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina covers the question, because it provides that it shall be made mandatory upon the Secretary of Agriculture hereafter to purchase similar seeds to those which have been purchased in prior years. That removes all doubt in the matter, and there can be no question but that the Secretary will be compelled to make the purchase.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I will say to the gentleman that the Secretary raised exactly the same objections before he sought the opinion of the Attorney-General that he did afterwards.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, I suppose he wanted to have his action backed up by a decision of the chief legal officer of the Government, and he got it, or thought he got it, and was satisfied with it. I think the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina ought to be adopted.

A MEMBER. Let the amendment be read again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment as above.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the proposed substitute for that amendment.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Chairman, after listening to the argument of the gentleman from Tennessee as to the discretionary power of the Secretary, I will, with the consent of the committee, withdraw my substitute.

There was no objection.

Mr. MCEWAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Insert in line 25, page 20, after the word "dollars," the following: "The distribution to be made in the same manner as was done by the previous Secretaries of the Department of Agriculture."

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is covered by the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard for a minute upon the proposition now before the House, the amendment just read. The trouble that we find with the law as now written upon the statute book is that the Secretary of Agriculture so construes it that he refuses to carry out the true spirit and intent of that law as we all understand it. Now, for this body to insert into this bill a worse provision than is already found there would be, to my mind, mere nonsense. Every lawyer knows that when you write in the statute book something that is so indefinite that it can not be executed it amounts to nothing and the executive officers are at perfect liberty to disregard it. When you propose to say in this bill that the usual purchase of seeds shall be made, that the Secretary shall purchase seeds under the law and distribute them as former Secretaries of Agriculture have done in years gone by, it is an indefinite provision which will amount to nothing.

Such a provision would impose no obligation upon the Secretary of Agriculture. He would not be under any obligation to hunt through the acts performed by previous Secretaries to ascertain in what particular mode or manner they had executed the law, and he would not do it, but would shield himself under the rule which all lawyers understand, that such a provision pointing out no particular thing that the officer is to do, but only generally directing him, to imitate the conduct of someone who has gone before him is so indefinite that it can not be executed, and may be disregarded by the executive officer.

Now, I am as anxious as any member of this House can be to have a provision inserted in this bill which will compel the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase seeds as has been done heretofore and to distribute them to the farmers of this country, because there is a general demand from the farmers all over the land for this distribution of seed. But I want our action on this subject to be wise. I want a provision inserted in this bill that there shall be no mistake or question about, and I want it prepared with more care than has been devoted to the one now before this committee. I want it to be explicit. I want it to tell the Secretary of Agriculture just what he shall do, and not send him on a wild-goose chase, to ascertain what has been done by someone in the Department in prior years, because if we put it in that form I repeat that he probably will refuse to execute the law because of its indefiniteness.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from New York is in error in the construction which he puts upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina. Ordinarily such an amendment as that now offered would be subject to the criticism which the gentleman from New York has passed upon it. But I submit to him that the Secretary of Agriculture can not claim that he misunderstands the intention of the House of Representatives in the enactment of this law, or that he has any doubt about the construction of the law, when he is commanded to execute it as he did execute it for two successive years and as it was executed by his predecessors. He knows that for two years after his induction into the office he now occupies he expended this appropriation in the purchase of all sorts of garden and field seeds, distributing them in various sections of the country, allotting them to members of Congress according to the climatic conditions of their districts. He knows how he executed the law. He refused to expend the last appropriation upon the ground that the manner in which such an appropriation had before been expended was inconsistent with the statute under which the appropriation was made.

Now, then, since his refusal to expend the appropriation in accordance with the custom which had prevailed because of his contention that it was not in accordance with the statute, this House legislatively declares that it was in accord with the terms and the spirit of the statute and commands him to continue the execution of that statute as he had executed it during the two preceding years. If he should fail to expend the appropriation under the terms stated, in accordance with the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina, he would be acting in deliberate and willful contempt and disregard of the legislative mandate; he would be refusing to execute a law of Congress about the meaning of which there could be no misconception.

Now, we can not in an act of this kind direct him as to the particular classes of seeds which he shall purchase. We can not say he shall buy so much of this kind of seed and so much of the other; so many trees of this sort and so many of another. We can not go into such particulars; but we can command him to exercise under the law the discretion which he did exercise during two years of this Administration, and which was exercised by his predecessors in office. I think, Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina sufficiently covers the case, and that if the Secretary of Agriculture should refuse to execute such a provision he would refuse to execute any law which we might pass on the subject.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the various amendments now pending may either be voted down or held in abeyance for the present until the reading of the paragraph pertaining to this subject has been completed. I have an amendment at the desk which I think will satisfy the gentlemen who have spoken on the subject and those who have moved the amendments now pending.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HULL reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5161) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and had come to no resolution thereon.

AMERICAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES IN GERMANY.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 18, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

THE JOURNAL—COIN REDEMPTION BILL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Mr. ALLEN. Before the minutes are approved I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

I observe on page 1786 of the RECORD, in yesterday's proceedings, that a message from the House of Representatives announced to the Senate "that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue." The RECORD is silent as to whether the House requested the appointment of a conference committee or not, and I take it that this is a proper time to call the attention of the Senate Finance Committee to this matter and ask them if there is any intention upon the part of that committee to request a conference with the House of Representatives upon the disagreement arising between the two Houses with respect to this bill.

From the votes which have been taken in the Senate from time to time during the present session of Congress, and from the fact that, I think with the single exception of the chairman of the Finance Committee, every member of that committee has announced that he is a bimetallist and in favor of the use of both gold and silver in our money, I infer that some effort will be made upon the part of the Senate Finance Committee to bring about an adjustment of the differences between the Senate and House upon the bill. That has been the course which has been pursued since I have been a member of the Senate in regard to every bill where there is a disagreement between the two Houses. I think this is the only instance I have ever known where there was a failure to request a conference, and I infer that it was an oversight, possibly of the chairman of the Finance Committee or of some member of the committee, when the announcement of the action of the House was made to the Senate. Before the minutes are approved I should like to know if that be true.

Mr. MORRILL. I can say to the Senator from Nebraska that we are waiting for some action on the part of the other House. If they desire a conference I suppose they will ask for it, and their request will be responded to here.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire to express the hope that there is no premeditated intention on the part of the Senate Finance Committee and the House Finance Committee to let the matter drop at this time for political purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will have the Secretary read an extract from the Journal by way of explanation.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 14, 1896.

Resolved, That the House nonconcur in the amendments of the Senate to House bill 2904, entitled "An act to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue."

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry. I ask whether on that report being made to the Senate it would be in order for the Senator from Nebraska to move to recede from the Senate amendments, or whether he would be obliged to wait until after the bill itself should come back from the other House?

Mr. CULLOM. I think the first thing in order is to approve the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, if there is no objection to the manner in which it is made up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will determine the parliamentary question when it arises. Without objection, the Journal stands approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a cummunication from the Postmaster-General, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 10th instant, certain information as to whether any person or persons in the employ of the Post-Office Department has applied for or has received any patent for an invention, or improvement of existing invention, made or received since his entry into the employ of the Post-Office Department, etc.; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter of the 14th instant from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs relative to the use of unexpended balances of appropriations for subsistence and civilization of the Northern Cheyennes and Arapahoes for the fiscal years 1895 and 1896 not needed for that purpose in the purchase of stock cattle for the benefit of that portion of these tribes located on the Tongue River Reservation, in Montana, and requesting that the matter receive the favorable action of Congress; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CHAPELL, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to some and disagreed to other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4321) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4 to the bill (H. R. 4321) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes, with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4321) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CANNON, Mr. NORTHWAY, and Mr. SAYERS managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 5819) to provide for the examination and classification of certain lands in the State of California; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. 1442) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota";

A bill (H. R. 1591) to extend the mineral-land laws of the United States to lands embraced in the north half of the Colville Indian Reservation;

A bill (H. R. 2642) granting leave of absence for one year to homestead settlers upon the Yankton Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 2654) to amend an act entitled "An act to punish false swearing before trial boards of the Metropolitan police force and fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved May 11, 1892;

A bill (H. R. 2769) to authorize the leasing of lands for educational purposes in Arizona;

A bill (H. R. 3553) to incorporate the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution; and

A bill (H. R. 4810) extending the time within which the Maryland and Washington Railway Company shall be required to complete the building of the road of said company, under the provisions of an act of Congress approved August 1, 1892, as amended by an act of Congress approved March 2, 1895.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SEWELL. I present a memorial of the Peace Association of Friends of Philadelphia to the President and Congress of the United States, on the attitude of Congress relative to the Monroe doctrine. Coming from a very distinguished association, I move that the memorial lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

By unanimous consent, the memorial was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the President of the United States and the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The Peace Association of Friends of Philadelphia respectfully represent:

That they have been deeply moved by the menace of war between our beloved country and the parent nation, and earnestly entreat you to take no step which may increase the danger of such a calamity.

We also respectfully protest against the passage of the resolution reported by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, giving the sanction of Congress to a development of the sentiment originally enunciated by President Monroe, but hitherto advocated without color of law. By implication, if not directly, there appears to be thus claimed for the United States a self-constituted protectorate over all the other Republics in this hemisphere.

We urge that the attitude assumed by the resolution above referred to is without sanction in international usage, without historic authority, and unwarranted by the other nations concerned. Furthermore, we believe it is not rendered necessary, as alleged, because of any threatened danger to this country, while it is in its spirit belligerent and unchristian. We therefore feel that the deliberate assertion of what must be regarded as a virtual protectorate, established by the lawmaking power of the United States, would be a grave mistake, and that it were far wiser to leave the subject, as heretofore, an unformulated popular sentiment.

We submit that the position taken by President Monroe, but since repudiated by eminent statesmen, is fraught with too momentous consequences to be safely adopted by Congress under the stimulus of the present exciting controversy as to the boundary of Venezuela, while its importance demands long, careful, and cool discussion. We are persuaded that the maintenance of peaceful relations with all nations is far more in harmony with the spirit of our institutions and more worthy of a truly enlightened people than any question of boundary or ownership among the Republics of South America.

Let us therefore entreat you to listen to the teachings of the "Prince of Peace," as plainly set forth in the gospel, and not commit our hitherto favored country to a sentiment and line of foreign policy inimical to its highest interests.

Signed on behalf of the Peace Association of Friends of Philadelphia.

SAMUEL MORRIS, President.
PHILIP C. GARRETT, Vice-President.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Secondmonth 3d, 1896.

Mr. SEWELL presented the petition of Mrs. V. F. Cox, superintendent of the department of Sabbath observance of the New Jersey Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and the petition of Mrs. H. H. Logan, president, and Mrs. C. H. Green, secretary, of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Morristown, N. J., praying for the enactment of a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented the memorial of Joshua Matlack, jr., of Mount Holly, N. J., relative to the war in Cuba and the assertion of the Monroe doctrine; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LODGE presented the petition of C. D. Mosher, of Chicago, Ill., praying for the establishment of United States national postal coupon savings banks in every post-office in America; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of L. P. Plummer Post, No. 50, Department of Minnesota, Grand Army of the Republic, praying for the passage of House bill No. 306, granting a pension to soldiers and sailors confined in so-called Confederate prisons; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VEST presented resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of Kansas City, Mo., indorsing House bill No. 3212, providing for the extension of foreign markets for American breadstuffs; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BURROWS presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted by Sedgwick Post, No. 16, Grand Army of the Republic, of Evart, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation donating to them one condemned cannon for use on Memorial Day and other patriotic occasions; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Michigan Association of Union ex-Prisoners of War, praying for the passage of House bill No. 306, granting a pension to soldiers and sailors confined in so-called Confederate prisons; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PEFFER. I present the petition of Mrs. Alfaretta Mitchell, president of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Varck, Kans., representing a large number of people, praying Congress to pass what they call a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia, and also praying Congress not to pass any legislation to establish a bureau of military education and promote the adoption of uniform military drill in the public schools of the several States and Territories. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I present a letter addressed to me, in the nature of a petition to the Senate of the United States, with the request that I should ask that it be printed as a miscellaneous document for the information of the Senate and of the committee that may have charge of this subject.

The letter states that an American citizen, Mr. Clune, the treasurer of the American Railway Union in Los Angeles, Cal., is imprisoned by Judge Ross in the Los Angeles County jail under a sentence of eighteen months for an alleged conspiracy, the only evidence of which was the fact of his being an officer of the American Railway Union and engaged in a strike or withdrawal of services from the Southern Pacific Railroad corporation, without any violence or any detention of the United States mails, and without any trial by jury or being confronted with witnesses. I am requested to have it printed for the purpose of informing the Senate and of aiding in obtaining such legislation as will prevent the arbitrary imprisonment of American citizens under judicial process, and also to create a public opinion favorable to his release from confinement through a pardon by the President.

This proceeding, if the statements of the letter of Mr. Clune, written from Los Angeles jail, be true, demand the immediate consideration of the Senate.

The authority to deprive a citizen of the United States of his personal liberty, take him forcibly from his family and incarcerate him in jail for eighteen months, without a jury trial and without witnesses, on the order of a single judge, and the denial of appeal to any other tribunal, is a violation of all constitutional provisions for the security of personal liberty, and is nothing less than the lettres de cachet of the French kings.

The statements of this letter should receive from the Senate, charged with the duty of protecting all the guaranties of the Constitution by proper legislative provisions, the most serious consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. PLATT. To what?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To printing the letter as a document. The Chair hears no objection. The petition will lie on the table for the present.

Mr. HANSBROUGH presented resolutions adopted by the Maryland Division, Sons of Veterans, United States Army, of Baltimore, Md., praying Congress to pass the bill making the anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln a national holiday; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GORDON presented the memorial of Mast, Crowell & Kirkpatrick, publishers, of Springfield, Ohio, remonstrating against the proposed increase of postage on serials, books issued in serial form, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the petition of Rev. C. C. Cary, of Forsyth, Ga., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 239, to prohibit the collection of special liquor taxes from persons other than those who are duly authorized by State laws to traffic in intoxicating liquors; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. On behalf of the Committee on Privileges and Elections I present the resolution and report I submitted yesterday and then temporarily withdrew in the matter of the claim of Henry A. Du Pont, of the State of Delaware, to a seat in the Senate from that State. I ask that the resolution and report, without reading the report, be printed in the RECORD in full, and I give notice that at an early date I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution appended to the report will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That Henry A. Du Pont is entitled to a seat in the Senate from the State of Delaware for the full term commencing March 4, 1895.

Mr. TURPIE. I am authorized by the minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections to submit the views of the Senators composing the minority in the case of Henry A. Du Pont upon his petition for a seat in this body, and to ask that the views be printed as a part of the RECORD.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. And that the report and the views of the minority be printed together as a document.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered. The resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the petition of Henry A. Du Pont, of the State of Delaware, claiming a seat in the Senate from that State in virtue of an election by the legislature thereof on May 9, 1895, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to submit the following report:

STATEMENT OF FACTS.

There is in this case no material contention as to the facts. It is conceded the petitioner, Henry A. Du Pont, was, at the date of his alleged election, a citizen of the United States and an inhabitant of the State of Delaware, over 30 years of age, and in all respects qualified to become a Senator.

The legislature of the State of Delaware consists of a senate, composed of 9 senators, 3 of whom are elected from each of the three counties of the State, and a house of representatives of 21 members, 7 of whom are elected from each of the three counties of the State. When there are no vacancies in the membership, and all are present in joint assembly of the two houses for the purpose of electing a United States Senator, such joint assembly is composed of 30 members, thus requiring the votes of 16 members to elect.

In the event of one vacancy, caused either by death, resignation, inability to act, or for any other reason, then the joint assembly, all others being present, would be composed of 29 members, in which event the votes of 15 members would be sufficient to elect.

At the meeting of the joint assembly of the legislature of Delaware on the 9th day of May, 1895, which assembly, it is conceded, was in all respects regularly called and held in pursuance of law, the final vote was as follows:

Joint meeting proceeded to another ballot, which resulted as follows:

Mr. Alrichs, of the senate, voted for	H. A. Du Pont.
Mr. Fenimore	Ed. Ridgley.
Mr. Hanby	J. Edward Addicks.
Mr. Harrington	Ed. Ridgley.
Mr. Moore	H. A. Du Pont.
Mr. Pierce	H. A. Du Pont.
Mr. Pyle	Ed. Ridgley.
Mr. Records	Ed. Ridgley.
Mr. Speaker	Ed. Ridgley.
Mr. Ball, of the house, voted for	J. Edward Addicks,
Mr. Brown	H. A. Du Pont.
Mr. Burton	H. A. Du Pont.
Mr. Daly	Ed. Ridgley.
Mr. Davis	Ed. Ridgley.
Mr. Fleming	H. A. Du Pont.
Mr. Jolls	H. A. Du Pont.
Mr. Killen	Ed. Ridgley.
Mr. Money	H. A. Du Pont.
Mr. Moore	John Edward Addicks.
Mr. Morgan	H. A. Du Pont.
Mr. Mustard	Ebe W. Tunnell.
Mr. Pyle	H. A. Du Pont.
Mr. Reybold	H. A. Du Pont.
Mr. Robbins	J Edward Addicks.
Mr. Sypherd	Edward Ridgley.
Mr. Townsend	H. A. Du Pont.
Mr. Walker	H. A. Du Pont.
Mr. Watson	Ed. Ridgley.
Mr. Wilson	H. A. Du Pont.
Mr. Speaker	H. A. Du Pont.

The vote as above ascertained having been announced, as follows:

	Votes.
H. A. Du Pont had	15
Ed. Ridgley had	10
J. Edward Addicks had	4
Ebe W. Tunnell had	1

There being present in such joint assembly, and each casting a vote, 30 persons, each claiming to be a member of the legislature of the State of Delaware and entitled to vote for United States Senator.

It is conceded by Mr. Du Pont, and by your committee, that if this contention is true; that is, if each of the 30 persons so present in such joint assembly, and each of whom cast a vote for Senator, was a duly qualified member of the legislature of the State of Delaware, and under no disability, as such, which would deprive him of his right to a seat in such assembly, and to cast a vote for Senator, then Mr. Du Pont was not elected Senator, and is not entitled to a seat in the Senate.

It is admitted upon the part of Mr. Du Pont, and such is the fact, that of the 30 persons so present and claiming a right to vote as aforesaid, 29 of them were so qualified. It is contended, however, that 1 of the 30, namely, William T. Watson, claiming to be a senator from the county of Kent, and claiming to be the speaker of the senate, and claiming the right, as such senator, to be present and participate in the proceedings of such joint assembly, and to cast his vote for Senator, was not entitled, under the constitution of the State of Delaware and the laws of the land, to be present in such joint assembly, had no right to be counted therein in making up the number present, and had no right to cast his vote in such assembly for any person for Senator.

If this contention upon the part of Mr. Du Pont is correct, then it is conceded, provided the right to inquire into Watson's qualifications to vote in such assembly now exists, that, inasmuch as in that event there were but 29 members of the legislature of the State of Delaware present entitled to vote, and as it is conceded Mr. Du Pont received the votes of 15 of such members, no one of which was that of Mr. Watson, thus receiving a clear majority of all the votes cast entitled to be cast, he was duly elected Senator, and is entitled to his seat.

The whole question involved, then, in this case is as to the right of Watson to be present in such joint assembly, and to be counted therein in making up the number present, so as to require the votes of 16 members to make an election.

The ground upon which it is claimed upon the part of Mr. Du Pont that Mr. Watson was ineligible to a seat in such joint assembly, and should not have been counted therein in making up the number constituting the same, is based on the fact that, although he had been duly elected a senator from the county of Kent, and from the commencement of the session in January, 1895, until April 9 of that year had held and occupied a seat in the senate, and had been elected speaker thereof, and served in that capacity, he had, on the 9th day of April, 1895, the governor of the State of Delaware, Joshua H. Marvil, having died the day previous, succeeded to the governorship of the State in virtue of a provision of the constitution of that State, and from that date until the 9th day of May following had continued to exercise the functions and duties of executive of the State, and has ever since and still continues to exercise the office of governor of said State, and that, therefore, on that date, May 9, 1895, he, then holding the office of and being the governor of the State of Delaware, was ineligible to a seat in said joint assembly, and had no right whatever, under the provisions of the constitution of the State and of the laws of the land, to be present, either to participate by his vote or otherwise, or to be counted therein.

Your committee hold that this contention on the part of Mr. Du Pont is well founded.

The clause in the Delaware constitution, in pursuance of which Mr. Watson, as speaker of the senate, became governor on April 9, 1895, and which will be commented on later in this report, is found in section 14 of Article III, and is as follows:

Upon any vacancy happening in the office of governor by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified.

It is conceded a vacancy in the office of governor occurred on April 8, 1895, by the death of the then governor of the State, Joshua H. Marvil; also that Senator Watson was then and on April 9, 1895, speaker of the senate, and that on this latter date he took the required oaths, was inaugurated, and entered upon the exercise of the office of governor, and has continued to hold and exercise such office ever since.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE LEGISLATURE.

The legislature of the State of Delaware met in biennial session on the first Tuesday of January, 1895, and on that day organized by the election of speakers and other officers for the senate and house of representatives. There were at that time 9 members of the senate and 21 members of the house of representatives, 3 senators and 7 representatives having been chosen from each of the three counties in the State. At the organization of the senate William T. Watson was duly elected speaker and continued in the discharge of his official duties as speaker of the senate, save during occasional absences, until the 9th day of April, 1895, the day following that on which Joshua H. Marvil, governor of the State of Delaware, died.

This legislature being charged with the duty of electing a Senator of the United States for the constitutional term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1895, and having failed to elect such Senator on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization of such legislature, convened in joint assembly on the next day, being the 16th day of January, pursuant to the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate the times and manner of holding elections for Senators in Congress," approved July 25, 1866, and proceeded to vote for a United States Senator.

No one having been elected to that office on that day, the legislature, pursuant to the provisions of said act, convened in joint assembly on the following and succeeding days, Sundays excepted, until and including Thursday, the 9th day of May, 1895. No one was elected United States Senator prior to the day last named.

On the 9th day of April aforesaid, immediately after the joint assembly of the two houses had separated, Senator William T. Watson, who at the time of the death of Governor Marvil, which occurred on the preceding day, had been speaker of the senate, took the official oaths prescribed for the governor of the State of Delaware, and forthwith entered upon the exercise of that office.

It is conceded that from the commencement of the voting for a United States Senator until and including the 9th day of April, Senator William T. Watson took part in such voting except during occasional absences.

Furthermore it is a conceded fact, and if not conceded, fully borne out by the journal entries and other testimony, that from the time he took the oaths of office and assumed the functions of governor in the exercise of such office until the final joint assembly of the two houses on the 9th day of May, Governor Watson did not upon any occasion take any part either in the proceedings of the Senate or of the joint assembly.

And further, it is clear to your committee from the record and other evidence submitted that from the hour of his inauguration as governor, by taking the constitutional oaths required of a governor, his name was dropped from the roll call of the senate and was never once called, either as of speaker or as of a senator, on any roll call had on any bill, resolution, or motion until the final adjournment of the Senate. Senator Alrichs, in his affidavit of date January 28, 1896 (Document 9, part 6, page 1), shows this conclusively, and it is not contradicted by any affidavit filed in the case. The following is Senator Alrichs's affidavit in full:

AFFIDAVIT OF SAMUEL ALRICHS.

STATE OF DELAWARE, Newcastle County, ss:

On this 28th day of January, A. D. 1896, before me, Edward G. Cook, a notary public for the State of Delaware in and for Newcastle County, personally comes Samuel Alrichs, who, being by me first duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

That he is a member of the senate of the State of Delaware, as stated by him in a previous affidavit made in the above matter; that he took his seat in said senate on the 1st day of January, A. D. 1895, for a term of four years; that, after William T. Watson took the oath of office as governor of the State of Delaware, upon the death of Governor Marvil, to wit, on the 9th day of April, A. D. 1895, to the expiration of the last session of the senate on the 9th day of May of said year, the clerk of the senate did not call the name of William T. Watson as a member of the senate. He was neither on the call of the roll at the assembling of any session, nor upon the taking of any roll call upon bill, resolution, or other motion. He was not reported by the clerk as either present or absent; neither was his name called or recorded upon the taking of any yea or nay vote as being present or absent. William T. Watson's name was thus dropped from the rolls after he became governor by reason of no special order, or action, or motion, or otherwise, taken in respect thereto by the senate. It must have been done by order of the speaker pro tempore. It was, however, in accordance with the general understanding of the members of the senate that William T. Watson was no longer a member of that body.

SAMUEL ALRICHS.

Sworn to and subscribed before me the day and year first above written, as witness my hand and official seal.

[SEAL.] EDWARD J. COOK,
Notary Public.

It is conceded, however, that Governor Watson did, on the 9th day of May aforesaid, enter the final joint assembly and assume the right to be counted as a member of such assembly, and the right to vote therein for a United States Senator. During this final assembly 28 ballots were had for United States Senator. The vote upon each ballot, as shown by the record of such assembly, was as follows:

	Votes.
Henry A. Du Pont	15
Ed. Ridgely	10
J. E. Addicks	4
E. W. Tunnell	1

William T. Watson, the governor of the State of Delaware, as aforesaid, cast his vote each time for Ed. Ridgely.

THE VITAL QUESTION.

It will be seen, therefore, the whole question of the right of Mr. Du Pont to a seat in the Senate, as claimed, turns upon the single question: Had William T. Watson, then holding and exercising the office of governor of the State of Delaware, a right, under the constitution of the State and the laws of the land, to exercise the office of State senator, and as such to sit in the joint assembly on May 9, 1895, to be counted therein in making up the number constituting such joint assembly, and to vote therein for a United States Senator? Your committee are clearly of the opinion he had not.

PROPOSITIONS INVOLVED.

In determining this question three different propositions are presented for our consideration:

First. Did the offices of senator and speaker of the senate, held by William T. Watson from the commencement of the session of the Delaware legislature in January, 1895, until April 9, 1895, become absolutely vacant on the inauguration of said William T. Watson as governor of the State by taking the oaths of office required of a person entering upon the exercise of that office? Or,

Second. If such offices of senator and speaker of the senate did not become absolutely vacant upon such inauguration as governor, was the right of Watson to exercise the functions of both speaker of the senate and senator held in abeyance and suspended for and during the time he should continue to hold and exercise the office of governor? Or,

Third. While holding and exercising the office of governor, did said William T. Watson not only continue to hold the offices of senator and speaker of the senate, but did his right to exercise all the functions of such senator and speaker of the senate while holding and exercising the office of governor continue to exist?

The answer to either or both of the first two propositions in the affirmative settles the question in favor of the right of Mr. Du Pont to a seat, while an affirmative answer to the third proposition, which of course negatives the other two, would be a denial of his right to a seat.

In discussing these several propositions, therefore, it becomes, in the view taken by your committee, wholly unnecessary, in reaching a correct conclusion as to the merits of the present controversy, to determine the question as to whether the offices of senator and speaker of the senate became absolutely vacant upon the accession of the speaker of the senate to the office of governor, so as to entitle the electors of Kent County to fill such vacancy by election, or so as to prevent his resuming his place as senator and speaker at the termination of his term of office, and of his right to exercise the office of governor, as it is clear, if the right of Watson, while holding the office of governor and exercising that office, to exercise the functions of a senator, whether for the reason that his office as such senator had ipso facto become vacant, or for any other reason, based on a fair construction of the various provisions of the constitution of the State of Delaware, and the well-known rule of law relating to incompatible offices, was suspended, then in either of such events the presence of Governor Watson in the joint assembly May 9, 1895, and his voting for a United States Senator therein while holding and exercising the office of governor, were wholly illegal, and in such event his vote in such joint assembly should not be counted.

WHETHER THE OFFICES HELD BY MR. WATSON AS SENATOR AND SPEAKER OF THE SENATE DID OR DID NOT BECOME ABSOLUTELY VACANT ON HIS BECOMING GOVERNOR, IT IS CLEAR THAT WHILE HOLDING AND EXERCISING SUCH EXECUTIVE OFFICE HIS RIGHT TO EXERCISE ANY OF THE FUNCTIONS, EITHER OF THE OFFICE OF SENATOR OR SPEAKER OF THE SENATE, WAS ABSOLUTELY SUSPENDED.

Whether the offices held by Mr. Watson as senator and speaker of the senate did or did not become absolutely vacant on his becoming governor, it is clear that while holding and exercising such executive office his right to exercise any of the functions, either of the office of senator or speaker of the senate, was absolutely suspended.

This conclusion is based on what seems to your committee to be—

First. The only reasonable and fair construction of various provisions of the constitution of the State of Delaware;

Second. Because it is sustained and supported by the well-recognized rule of the common law, which inhibits either the holding or exercising simultaneously by the same person two incompatible offices, and also by the principles of our American system, that legislative and executive offices are incompatible; and Third. Because the uniform unbroken usage observed in Delaware by its governors, legislators, and people for more than one hundred years is to this effect; that is to say, that the right to exercise the offices of senator and speaker of the senate is suspended and held in abeyance during the time he is exercising the office of governor, and that both offices can not by such person be exercised simultaneously and in perfect harmony with the constitutional provisions of the State, which, in our judgment, expressly forbid the simultaneous exercise by the same person of the offices of governor and State senator.

LEGAL PROPOSITIONS.

Before proceeding to analyze these various constitutional provisions in their application to the present controversy, your committee respectfully submit the following propositions, the soundness of which it will endeavor to maintain:

First. It is a well-settled rule of the common law that the same person shall not exercise simultaneously two incompatible offices; and further, the acceptance of one is ipso facto a resignation of the other.

Second. Under the American system, executive and legislative offices are incompatible, and the same person can not exercise both simultaneously in the absence of either express or clearly implied statutory or constitutional authority, and the acceptance of a second such is ipso facto a resignation of the first.

Third. There is no express or implied authority in the Delaware constitution for the simultaneous exercise by the same person of the offices of governor and senator; on the contrary, the constitution expressly interdicts such exercise of those two offices, and therefore at the time when Mr. Du Pont received 15 votes in the joint assembly, Mr. Watson, being then governor of the State, holding and exercising that executive office, was incapable of exercising the office of senator.

Fourth. The theory that Mr. Watson can exercise the office of governor of the State and State senator simultaneously involves innumerable constitutional repugnancies, perplexing difficulties, and endless absurdities, while the opposite theory reconciles and harmonizes all the provisions of the Delaware constitution relating to the subject under consideration.

Fifth. Whether or not the offices of State senator and speaker of the senate became absolutely vacant when Speaker Watson took the oaths of office, was inaugurated governor of the State, and entered upon the exercise of that office, there can be no doubt, on a fair construction of the several constitutional provisions of the State of Delaware, that his right to exercise the office of senator or speaker of the senate, or any of the functions connected therewith, while he continued to hold and exercise the office of governor was absolutely suspended.

Sixth. That Governor Watson's exercise of the office of senator in the joint assembly and of the office of president of the joint assembly was illegal, and his vote for United States Senator a nullity.

Seventh. The journal entries of the proceedings of the Delaware senate on May 9, 1895, are conclusive as to the number and names of senators present, the motions submitted, the votes cast, and of all the proceedings had, and can not be contradicted by ex parte affidavits.

Eighth. The right which undoubtedly belongs exclusively to the Delaware senate to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members, does not vest in such senate any such exclusive right as would conclude the Senate of the United States, to determine by construction whether the constitution of the State does or does not recognize a certain seat as subject to occupation, nor does it include the power to admit members to seats not recognized by the constitution of the State as subject to occupation, or if subject to occupation, to fill them in a manner or by a person which the State constitution forbids.

This latter proposition will receive first consideration at the hands of your committee.

PROVISIONS OF THE DELAWARE CONSTITUTION.

The following are the several more important provisions of the constitution of the State of Delaware which have, as it is believed, any bearing upon this controversy. They are all, for convenience of the Senate, inserted here and will be considered and construed in pari materia. Certain other clauses will be cited and commented on later in this report:

ART. 2. SEC. 1. The legislative power of this State shall be vested in a general assembly, which shall consist of a senate and house of representatives.

ART. 3. SEC. 1. The supreme executive powers of the State shall be vested in a governor.

ART. 6. SEC. 1. The judicial power of this State shall be vested in a court of errors and appeals, a superior court, a court of chancery, an orphan's court, a court of oyer and terminer, a court of general sessions of the peace and jail delivery, a register's court, justices of the peace, and such other courts as the general assembly, with the concurrence of two-thirds of all the members of both houses, shall, from time to time, establish.

Section 14, of Article III, is as follows:

SEC. 14. Upon any vacancy happening in the office of governor, by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified. If there be no speaker of the senate, or upon a further vacancy happening in the office, by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the house of representatives shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified. If the person elected governor shall die, or become disqualified before the commencement of his term of office, or shall refuse to take the same, the person holding the office shall continue to exercise it until a governor shall be elected and duly qualified. If, upon a vacancy happening in the office of governor, there be no other person who can exercise said office within the provisions of the constitution, the secretary of state shall exercise the same until the next meeting of the general assembly, who shall immediately proceed to elect, by joint ballot of both houses, a person to exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified. If a vacancy occur in the office of governor, or if the governor-elect die or become disqualified before the commencement of his term, or refuse to take the office, an election for governor shall be held at the next general election, unless the vacancy happen within six days next preceding the election, exclusive of the day of the happening of the vacancy and the day of the election; in that case, if an election for governor would not have been held at said election without the happening of such vacancy, no election for governor shall be held at said election in consequence of such vacancy. If the trial of a contested election shall continue longer than until the third Tuesday of January next ensuing the election of a governor, the governor of the last year, or the speaker of the senate or of the house of representatives, who may then be in the exercise of the executive authority, shall continue therein until a determination of such contested election. The governor shall not be removed from his office for inability but with the concurrence of two-thirds of all the members of each branch of the legislature.

Section 12, Article II, provides as follows:

SEC. 12. * * * No person concerned in any army or navy contracts, nor member of Congress, nor any person holding any office under this State or the United States, except the attorney-general, officers usually appointed by the courts of justice, respectively, attorneys at law, and officers in the militia holding no disqualifying office shall, during his continuance in Congress or office, be a senator or representative.

Section 5 of Article III:

SEC. 5. No member of Congress, nor person holding any office under the United States, or this State, shall exercise the office of governor.

The following is the oath of office taken by each of the governors of the State of Delaware upon his accession to office. It is prescribed by Article VIII of the constitution:

Members of the general assembly and all officers, executive and judicial, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support the constitution of this State and to perform the duties of their respective offices with fidelity.

The following are the journal entries of the Delaware senate of proceedings therein on April 9, 1895:

The Hon. James L. Wolcott then administered, in the presence of the members of the senate, to Hon. William Tharp Watson, speaker of the senate, the following oaths of office as governor, to wit: "I, William T. Watson, do solemnly swear, on the holy evangels of Almighty God, that I will support the Constitution of the United States of America. So help me God."

"I, William T. Watson, do solemnly swear, on the holy evangels of Almighty God, that I will support the constitution of the State of Delaware. So help me God."

"I, William T. Watson, do solemnly swear, on the holy evangels of Almighty God, that I will perform the duties of the office of governor of the State of Delaware with fidelity. So help me God."

Thereupon the speaker called Mr. Pyle to the chair and retired from the senate chamber.

Section 1, Article VI, of the constitution is as follows:

SEC. 1. The judicial power of this State shall be vested in a court of errors and appeals, a superior court, a court of chancery, an orphans' court, a court of oyer and terminer, a court of general sessions of the peace and gaol delivery, a register's court, justices of the peace, and such other courts as the general assembly, with the concurrence of two-thirds of all the members of both houses, shall from time to time establish.

It is provided in Article III, section 3, that—

The governor shall hold his office during four years from the third Tuesday in January next ensuing his election, and shall not be eligible a second time to said office.

And in Article III, section 4, that—

SEC. 4. He shall be at least thirty years of age, and have been a citizen and inhabitant of the United States twelve years next before the first meeting of the legislature after his election, and the last six of that term an inhabitant of this State, unless he shall have been absent on the public business of the United States, or of this State.

Article III, section 11, provides as follows:

He shall, from time to time, give to the general assembly information of affairs concerning the State, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge expedient.

It is further provided in section 9 of Article III of the constitution, as follows:

SEC. 9. He shall have power to remit fines and forfeitures and to grant reprieves and pardons, except in cases of impeachment. He shall set forth in writing, fully, the grounds of all reprieves, pardons, and remissions, to be entered in the register of his official acts and laid before the general assembly at their next session.

The following are the provisions of the constitution of the State of Delaware bearing upon the election of senators and the constitution of the senate of that State:

ART. 2. SEC. 3. The senators shall be chosen for four years by the citizens residing in the several counties. * * *

There shall be three senators chosen in each county. When a greater number of senators shall by the general assembly be judged necessary, two-thirds of each branch concurring, they may by law make provision for increasing their number; but the number of senators shall never be greater than one-half nor less than one-third of the number of representatives.

SEC. 2. The representatives shall be chosen for two years by the citizens residing in the several counties. * * *

There shall be seven representatives chosen in each county, until a greater number of representatives shall by the general assembly be judged necessary; and then, two-thirds of each branch of the legislature concurring, they may by law make provision for increasing their number.

The qualifications of a senator of the legislature of the State of Delaware are prescribed by section 3 of Article II of the constitution of that State, as follows:

No person shall be a senator who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-seven years, and have, in the county in which he shall be chosen, a freehold estate in two hundred acres of land, or an estate in real or personal property, or in either, of the value of one thousand pounds at least, and have been a citizen and inhabitant of the State three years next preceding the first meeting of the legislature after his election, and the last year of that term an inhabitant of the county in which he shall be chosen, unless he shall have been absent on the public business of the United States or of this State.

While the qualifications of a representative in the legislature of the State of Delaware are set forth in section 2 of Article II, as follows:

No person shall be a representative who shall not have attained the age of 24 years, and have been a citizen and inhabitant of the State three years next preceding the first meeting of the legislature after his election, and the last year of that term an inhabitant of the county in which he shall be chosen, unless he shall have been absent on the public business of the United States or of this State.

While section 1 of Article IV provides that—

All elections for governor, senators, representatives, sheriffs, and coroners shall be held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November of the year in which they are to be held, and be by ballot.

Section 2 of Article II provides that—

The representatives shall be chosen for two years by the citizens residing in the several counties.

The senators shall be chosen for four years by the citizens residing in the several counties.

Section 4 of Article II provides that—

The general assembly shall meet on the first Tuesday of January, biennially, unless sooner convened by the governor. The first meeting of the general assembly under this amended constitution shall be on the first Tuesday of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-three, which shall be the commencement of biennial sessions.

It is provided in Article II, section 6, that—

Each house shall judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

While Article V, sections 1 and 2, are as follows:

ARTICLE V.

SECTION 1. The house of representatives shall have the sole power of impeaching; but two-thirds of all the members must concur in an impeachment. All impeachments shall be tried by the senate; and when sitting for that purpose the senators shall be upon oath or affirmation to do justice according to the evidence. No person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of all the senators.

SEC. 2. The governor, and all other civil officers under this State, shall be liable to impeachment for treason, bribery, or any high crime or misdemeanor in office. Judgment in such cases shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under this State; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law.

It is provided in Article III, section 14, as follows:

The governor shall not be removed from his office for inability, but with the concurrence of two-thirds of all the members of each branch of the legislature.

Article II, section 5, provides that—

Each house shall choose its speaker and other officers; and also each house, whose speaker shall exercise the office of governor, may choose a speaker pro tempore.

Article II, section 7, provides that—

Each house may, * * * with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member, etc.

Article VII, section 3, provides that—

The legislature, two-thirds of each branch concurring, may vest the appointment of sheriffs and coroners in the governor.

Article III, section 14, is as follows:

If upon a vacancy happening in the office of governor there be no other person who can exercise said office within the provisions of the constitution, the secretary of state shall exercise the same until the next meeting of the general assembly, who shall immediately proceed to elect, by joint ballot of both houses, a person to exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified.

A PRELIMINARY QUESTION—THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES MAY INQUIRE INTO THE RIGHT OF GOVERNOR WATSON TO A SEAT IN THE JOINT ASSEMBLY AND TO VOTE FOR A UNITED STATES SENATOR THEREIN.

At the threshold in this investigation we are confronted with the question, Has the Senate of the United States the constitutional power to inquire into the question as to the right of Watson, then governor of the State, to a seat in the State senate, and to be present in the joint assembly, and to vote for a United States Senator?

Those opposing the claim of Mr. Du Pont insist no such power exists, and the reason advanced in support of this contention is that the senate of Delaware passed judgment upon Watson's qualifications as a member of that body, and that such decision is conclusive.

Counsel, in opposition to the claim of Mr. Du Pont, cite section 6, Article II, of the constitution of the State of Delaware, as follows:

Each house shall judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

Then, conceding that in order to conclude the United States Senate, the State senate must have either actually or constructively acted, and rendered judgment upon the question of his right to a seat therein, it is by the opposition assumed, and the declaration is made, that such action was had, such judgment in this case was rendered, and hence the Senate of the United States is concluded.

Your committee deny this contention. They deny that the Delaware senate ever at any time after Watson became governor, either actually or constructively, passed upon his qualifications to a seat in that body. And it is upon this branch of the case there is any controversy whatever as to the facts.

It is conceded by your committee that Governor Watson, after having studiously refrained from attempting to exercise any of the functions of senator or speaker of the senate from the date of his inauguration as governor, April 9, 1895, until May 9, 1895, a fact also conceded by those opposing the claim of Mr. Du Pont, did on this latter date, May 9, 1895, the legislature being about to adjourn sine die, enter the senate chamber a few minutes before the hour of 12 o'clock meridian, at which time the senate was to proceed to the hall of the house of representatives to meet the members of the house in joint assembly for the purpose of electing a United States Senator, and after conversing with two or more members until a few moments before 12 o'clock meridian, did then, the president pro tempore leaving the chair, take the chair of speaker of the senate, all the business of the senate having been concluded, and immediately made this announcement:

The hour of 12 having arrived, the senate will proceed to take part in the joint assembly.

That, while occupying the chair as speaker of the senate, Governor Watson took no part whatever in any of the legislative functions of the senate, other than what related to proceeding to the hall of the house of representatives by the senate for the purpose of attending the joint assembly to elect a United States Senator. These are the facts and all the facts in reference to this matter, as found by your committee.

THE SENATE JOURNAL ENTRIES ARE CONCLUSIVE AS AGAINST EX PARTE AFFIDAVITS AS TO WHAT OCCURRED IN THE SENATE MAY 9, 1895.

This brings us to a consideration of the seventh proposition hereinbefore stated, namely: That the journal entries of the proceedings of the Delaware senate on May 9, 1895, are conclusive as to the number and names of senators present, the motions submitted, the votes cast, and of all the proceedings had, and can not be contradicted by ex parte affidavits.

The law is well settled by more than 120 adjudicated cases in the courts of last resort in more than twenty of the States in the American Union, as also by the Supreme Court of the United States, that where a State constitution prescribes such formalities in the enactment of laws as require a record of the yeas and nays on the legislative journals, those journals are conclusive as against, not only a printed statute published by authority of law, but also against a duly enrolled act. The principle now contended for falls far short of going to this extent.

The question involved in the case under consideration is not whether the legislative journals are conclusive against a printed statute or an enrolled act, but whether they are conclusive as against ex parte affidavits by which such journals are sought to be contradicted.

Your committee, without indulging in argument upon this point, beg to attract attention to the following authorities, national and State, which hold to the doctrine that legislative journals are conclusive as against a duly enrolled act. Surely, if this be so, it can not be otherwise than they are conclusive against ex parte affidavits, the reason for this application of the rule being infinitely stronger than for the other.

The following is a list of the authorities, 124 in number, relied on. It is believed few Federal or State authorities can be found to conflict with these. Decisions can be found, as, for instance, in Field v. Clark (143 U. S., 649–678), to the effect that where the constitution contains no provision requiring entries on the journal of particular matters, such, for example, as calls of the yeas and nays on a measure in question, the enrolled acts can not in such case be impeached by the journal. That, however, is a very different proposition from the one involved here.

The constitution of Michigan contained the following clause:

No public act shall take effect or be in force until the expiration of ninety days from the end of the session at which the same is passed, unless the legislature shall otherwise direct, by a two-thirds vote of the members elected to each house.

In People v. Mahany (13 Mich., 481, 492) Mr. Justice Cooley, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

As the court are bound judicially to take notice of what the law is, we have no doubt it is our right, as well as our duty, to take notice not only of the printed statute books, but also of the journals of the two houses, to enable us to determine whether all the constitutional requisites to the validity of a statute have been complied with. The printed statute is not even prima facie valid, when other records, of which the court must equally take notice, show that some constitutional formality is wanting.

The constitution of California contained the following provision:

No bill shall become a law without the concurrence of a majority of the members elected to each house.

In the Railroad Tax Case (8 Sawyer, 238, 293) Judge Sawyer, with the concurrence of Mr. Justice Field, said:

On March 4 the house considered the senate amendment, and, upon a call of the yeas and nays, as required by the constitution, thirty-nine members voted for the amendment and thirty-two against it, there being four paired and not voting; thus the votes, in favor of the amendment, were two less than a majority of members elected to the house, and the bill failed. * All this appears upon the journal. * The bill, therefore, was never constitutionally passed, and never became a law. Under the decisions of the courts, upon constitutional provisions in all respects similar to that in the present constitution of California, it is settled that the court, to inform itself, will look to the journals of the legislature.

In Spangler v. Jacoby (14 Ill., 297, 300) the court said:

The act in question was signed by the speakers of the two houses, and it received the assent of the executive. Prima facie, therefore, it became a law. But the journal of the house of representatives fails wholly to show that it was ever put upon its final passage in that house; in other words, it does not appear that it passed with the concurrence of a majority of the members-elect of that body. The act did not become a law in pursuance of the provisions of the constitution, and it is therefore null and void. The judgment is reversed.

In Berry v. R. R. Co. (41 Md., 446, 463, 465), Judge Alvey, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

The question has repeatedly arisen, in several of the State courts of the highest authority, and in all cases, with but few exceptions, it has been held that neither the printed statute book nor the ordinary authentication of the statute after its passage would preclude the inquiry into the fact whether the statute, as published, had in truth passed the legislature; and, as evidence upon the question, the legislative journals and the bills as acted upon by the legislative assemblies have been consulted. * We can have no doubt whatever that the third section of the act in question, as that act was sealed and approved by the governor, is materially different from the third section of the act as it passed the two houses of the legislature, and we must therefore declare that particular section of the act to be null and void.

The constitution of the State of Delaware, Article II, section 17, contains the following clause:

No act of incorporation, except for the renewal of existing corporations, shall be hereafter enacted without the concurrence by two-thirds of each branch of the legislature.

This provision requires the yeas and nays to be recorded in the journals on the passage of every new act of incorporation.

THE DELAWARE SENATE DID NOT, EITHER ACTUALLY OR CONSTRUCTIVELY, JUDGE OF THE QUALIFICATIONS OF GOVERNOR WATSON TO A SEAT IN THE SENATE AT ANY TIME SUBSEQUENT TO HIS BECOMING GOVERNOR OF THE STATE.

As bearing upon the question as to what occurred either of a legislative or quasi-judicial character in the Delaware senate on May 9, 1895, Mr. Du Pont presents a certified copy of the senate journal entries of the proceedings of the senate of that date (Doc. 9, Part II, pp. 431), and insists such journal entries are conclusive upon that question. Mr. Du Pont, however, as is his right, presents also the ex parte affidavits of certain State senators and others, not for the purpose, however, of contradicting, but confirming such journal entries; while those opposing Mr. Du Pont present certain ex parte affidavits tending strongly to impeach and contradict such journal entries in certain respects.

Should these affidavits tending to impeach the journal entries be considered as competent evidence, then there is a slight conflict of testimony in respect to the exact time and manner in which Governor Watson attempted to resume and did resume his seat as speaker of the senate on said 9th day of May, 1895.

Your committee, however, while protesting such ex parte affidavits can not be considered in so far as they tend to impeach the journal entries, regard this conflict as immaterial and as not in any manner materially affecting the merits of the case, whatever view may be taken of the testimony.

Upon the part of those opposing Mr. Du Pont and denying his right to a seat in the senate it is contended, which contention it is sought to maintain by these ex parte affidavits contradictory of the senate journal entries, and which is, in the judgment of your committee, not sustained, but, on the contrary, clearly contradicted by the senate journal entries and other evidence submitted, except so far as hereinbefore conceded, that Governor Watson entered the senate chamber on said 9th day of May "between the hours of 11 and 12 o'clock"—just how long before 12, whether fifty-nine minutes or five seconds before, is not stated in the affidavits filed—the senate being in session, and took the chair as speaker of the senate; that he presided over the senate until 12 o'clock m., the hour for the two houses to convene in joint assembly; how long he so presided, whether fifty-nine minutes or one minute or one second, is not stated in any of the affidavits filed, nor is it disclosed by the record; that while he presided over the senate, it is claimed in one or more of these affidavits, he "voted in the affirmative upon at least one corporation bill," and declared that such bill had passed the senate, it having received the required constitutional majority. What corporation bill it was which it is alleged he so voted on is not disclosed, either by the affidavit of Governor Watson himself, which is filed in the case, or by any other testimony.

It is further claimed he, while presiding in the senate, "put motions made by senators," but what motion or motions he so put is not stated either in briefs of counsel or in any of the evidence submitted. In so far as these several affidavits filed in opposition to Mr. Du Pont relate to the exact time when Governor Watson assumed the speaker's chair in the senate they are not contradictory of the affidavits filed by Mr. Du Pont. The latter say it was after all the legislative business was ended and just as the senate was about to proceed to the hall of the house of representatives to take part in the joint assembly (which all agree was 12 m.), while the former are to the effect that he entered the senate chamber between the hours of 11 and 12 o'clock—how many moments before 12 m. is not stated—and that he, of course, subsequently took the chair.

That precisely what Governor Watson says on this subject may be readily seen, your committee present herewith his affidavit in full:

AFFIDAVIT OF WILLIAM T. WATSON, SPEAKER OF THE SENATE OF THE STATE OF DELAWARE.

STATE OF DELAWARE, Kent County, ss:

Be it remembered that on this 28th day of January, A. D. 1896, personally came before me, William E. Riggs, jr., a notary public of the State of Delaware, resident in Kent County, William T. Watson, who, being by me duly sworn according to law, did depose and say that he was elected speaker of the senate on the 1st day of January, A. D. 1895, and on the 9th day of April of the same year, after the death of Joshua Marvil, the duly elected and qualified governor of the State of Delaware, assumed the exercise of the office of governor; that on the 9th day of May, A. D. 1895, between the hours of 11 and 12 o'clock m., this affiant entered the senate chamber, whereupon William T. Records, speaker pro tempore, vacated the chair, and he, this affiant, took the same and presided over the senate until the hour for the two houses to assemble in joint meeting arrived, and then announced the same and proceeded at the head of the senators into the hall of the house of representatives, where he presided over the joint assembly from the beginning to the end thereof, and voted upon all questions which arose during the session, no objection having been made to his so presiding or voting until at or about the time the last ballot was taken, when Senator Alrichs read a written protest against his right to so vote and preside; that while he presided over the senate on that day in its chamber he voted upon one bill at least and announced its passage by the senate; that he received and put motions made by senators, and was addressed as speaker of that body, and that no objection from any quarter was made to his acting as presiding officer of the senate and otherwise participating in the proceedings thereof while in session during the hour aforesaid.

WILLIAM T. WATSON.

Sworn to and subscribed before me the day and year aforesaid.

[SEAL.] WILLIAM E. RIGGS, JR.,
Notary Public.

It will be seen Governor Watson admits in this affidavit his right to vote and preside in said joint assembly was challenged in writing.

SENATE JOURNAL ENTRIES AND EX PARTE AFFIDAVITS.

As bearing upon this question of fact, Mr. Du Pont has presented the following testimony:

(1) A copy of the journal entries of the proceedings of the senate of that date. (See Senate Document No. 9, part 2, first session Fifty-fourth Congress.) And also, in corroboration of and support of senate journal entries, the following:

(2) The affidavit of John M. C. Moore, a state senator of the Delaware senate from Sussex County. (See Doc. id., 31.)

(3) The affidavit of George F. Pierce, a state senator of the Delaware senate from Sussex County. (Doc. id., 33.)

(4) The affidavit of Samuel Alrichs, a state senator of the senate of Delaware from Newcastle County. (Doc. id., 34.)

(5) The affidavit of Edgar T. Hastings, clerk of the house of representatives of the State of Delaware. (Doc. id., 35.)

(6) The affidavit of John S. Prettyman, jr. (Doc. id., 36.)

(7) The affidavit of Frank Reedy. (Doc. id., 37.)

(8) The affidavit of George L. Townsend. (Doc. id., 38.)

(9) The affidavit of William Michael Byrne. (Senate Doc. 9, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session, part 4, pp. 1–3.)

(10) Second affidavit of State Senator Samuel Alrichs. (Doc. 9, part 6, p. 1.)

While in opposition to these journal entries, and contradictory thereof and of these several affidavits, those opposed to the claim of Mr. Du Pont have presented the following:

(1) The affidavit of Robert J. Hanby, State senator in the senate of Delaware from the county of Newcastle. (Doc. 9, part 3, p. 1.)

(2) The affidavit of William T. Records, State senator from Sussex County and speaker pro tempore of the Delaware senate. (Doc. 9, part 3, p. 2.)

(3) The affidavit of Charles A. Hastings, clerk of the senate of the State of Delaware.

(4) The affidavit of John B. Pennington (Doc. 9, part 3, p. 2.)

(5) The affidavit of Edward D. Hearne, assistant to Charles A. Hastings, the clerk of the senate (Doc. 9, part 3, p. 4).

(6) The affidavit of William T. Watson, claiming to be speaker of the senate of the State of Delaware (Doc. 9, part 5, p. 1).

(7) The affidavit of Cyrus Cort, chaplain of the senate of the State of Delaware for the session of 1895 (Doc. 9, part 5, p. 2).

For the convenience of the Senate this copy of the senate journal entries of the proceedings of the senate of the State of Delaware on May 9, 1895, also these affidavits, also the certificate of the election of Mr. Du Pont, signed by the speaker of the Delaware house of representatives and attested by the clerk of the house (see Doc. 9, pp. 1–5), together with the affidavits of Edgar T. Hastings, clerk of the Delaware house of representatives, Henry McMullen, speaker of said house, and Samuel Alrichs, a State senator, attached thereto (Doc. 9, pp. 3–8), are printed together in an appendix hereto attached, marked A, and made a part of the report of your committee.

It will be observed from the inspection of the journal entries of the proceedings of the Delaware senate of May 9, 1895, that at the convening of the senate at 11 o'clock a. m., Thursday, May 9, 1895, but 8 senators were present, including "Mr. Speaker pro tempore." No mention is made of the presence of Senator Watson or Speaker Watson (Doc. 9, part 2, p. 4), while the names making up the 8 senators alleged to be present are all given, as follows: Messrs. Alrichs, Fenimore, Hanby, Harrington, Moore, Pierce, Pyle, Mr. Speaker pro tempore.

It will be noticed, furthermore, that the yeas and nays were taken that date on but six different measures, as follows:

(1) On house bill entitled "An act to amend sections 5 and 10 of the act entitled 'An act to incorporate the town of Frederica.'"

On this question there were, yeas, 8; nays, 0.

(2) On house bill entitled "An act to incorporate the Acetyline Light Company."

On the passage of this bill the vote was, yeas, 8; nays, 0.

(3) On house bill entitled "An act to incorporate the Silverbrook Cemetery Company," on the passage of which the vote was, yeas, 8; nays, 0.

(4) On substitute for house bill entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Hall Company of Lewes."

On the passage of this bill the vote was, yeas, 7; nays, 0—Senator Hanby being either absent or not voting. The 7 voting for the bill did not include the name of Watson.

(5) On house bill entitled "An act relating to certain lands of the Wellman Iron and Steel Company, in Newcastle County."

On the passage of this bill the vote was, yeas, 8; nays, 0.

(6) On house bill entitled "An act to incorporate the Calhoun-Jones Company, of Georgetown, Sussex County."

On the passage of this bill the vote was, yeas, 8; nays, 0.

The foregoing were the only bills placed upon passage in the senate on May 9, 1895, on which the yeas and nays were taken and entered on the journal, and in each instance, except one, there were but 8 votes cast in all, including the speaker pro tempore, so called, and entered on the journal; and Watson was not present, either as senator or speaker of the senate, nor is his name anywhere mentioned, nor is his vote recorded on any of these bills, nor is he named as putting any motion to the senate or transacting any other business whatever.

In the one case above mentioned—that is, on the passage of the house measure entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Hall Company of Lewes," there were but 7 votes cast, including the speaker pro tempore, Senator Hanby not voting. Watson was not present or voting.

The only other proceedings had in the senate on that date, May 9, 1895, subsequent to the vote on the last house bill, on which the yeas and nays were called as above—that is, on the house bill entitled "An act to incorporate the Calhoun-Jones Company, of Georgetown, Sussex County" (Doc. 9, part 2, p. 7), are best stated by quoting in hæc verba the whole of the subsequent journal entries of the proceedings of that day, as follows:

Ordered, That the House be informed thereof, and the bill returned to that body.

Mr. Hastings, clerk of the house, being admitted, informed the senate that the house had passed and requested the concurrence of the senate in the following house bill entitled "An act to divorce Benjamin O. Jacobs from his wife, Victoria W. Jacobs."

Mr. Hastings, clerk of the house, being admitted, presented for the signature of the speaker of the senate the following duly and correctly enrolled house bills, the same having been signed by the speaker of the house.

An act to incorporate the Silverbrook Cemetery Company.

An act relative to bonds, undertakings, and other obligations with surety or sureties, to the acceptance as surety or guarantor thereupon of companies qualified to act as such and to provide a uniform system of procedure by and standard of qualifications for such companies.

Mr. Hastings, the clerk of the house, being admitted, returned to the senate the following duly and correctly enrolled senate bill, the same having been signed by the speakers of both houses:

An act to divorce Ellen Tatem Pusey from her husband, Joshua B. Pusey.

Mr. Hastings, clerk of the house, being admitted, informed the senate that the house had passed the following senate bills:

An act relating to certain lands of the Wellman Iron and Steel Company, in Newcastle County.

An act to incorporate Calhoun-Jones Company, of Georgetown.

An act to incorporate the North American Construction Company.

An act to divorce Elzey D. Richardson from his wife, Jennie A. Richardson.

And returned the same to the senate.

From the above record it will be observed no further measures were placed upon their passage, either by a call for the yeas and nays or otherwise. It was simply ordered that the house be advised of the passage of the above-named house bills.

The clerk of the house informed the senate—

(1) That the house had passed a bill to divorce Benjamin O. Jacobs from his wife, Victoria W. Jacobs.

(2) He presented for the signature of the speaker two bills.

(3) He announced that two certain bills had been signed by the speakers of both houses.

(4) He informed the senate that the house had passed four senate bills, and he returned the same to the senate.

From the beginning, therefore, until the end of the journal entries of the proceedings of the Delaware senate on May 9, 1895, there is not only no mention of the fact that Governor Watson was present and voted on any corporation or any other bill, either in the affirmative or negative, or that he put any motion or announced any result, but, on the contrary, the record discloses the fact he was not present, or at least did not vote on any roll call, during that entire day.

The only other bills placed on their passage in the senate May 9, 1895, other than those above mentioned, on which the yeas and nays were taken, and not one of which was a corporation bill, and all of which were acted upon prior to the action upon any one of the bills above named, on which the yeas and nays were called, were the following:

(1) An act relating to the salary of the attorney-general. (Doc. 9, part 2, p. 4.)

(2) An act for the relief of Robert Cook, deceased. (Id.)

(3) Joint resolutions in relation to paying William T. Smithers, and John D. Hawkins, secretary of state. (Id.)

(4) An act to prevent bogus sales within the State of Delaware, etc. (Doc. id.)

Your committee, therefore, in response to the contention of those opposing Mr. Du Pont, to the effect that the Delaware senate, as a matter of fact, acted upon and passed judgment May 9, 1895, on the qualifications of Governor Watson to a seat in the senate, say:

First. This is a question which can alone be determined by an inspection of the record of the journal entries of the senate, which record can not be contradicted by ex parte affidavits; and that such record is not merely silent on the subject, but affirmatively shows that Governor Watson took no part whatever, either as senator or speaker of the senate, in any of the proceedings of the senate on May 9, 1895, and furthermore, that no question as to his qualifications to a seat in the senate was submitted or acted upon, either directly or constructively; and

Second. Were it proper to admit ex parte affidavits in opposition to the record, a proposition denied by your committee, even then, giving to such affidavits every consideration and weight which should be accorded to them as competent testimony in the case, and taking into consideration all the evidence presented on both sides, the preponderance of such evidence is clearly to the effect that, as a matter of fact and law, the Delaware senate did not, on May 9, 1895, in any manner act or pass judgment, either actually or constructively, upon the qualifications of Governor Watson to a seat in the senate, and hence, for this reason, the Senate of the United States is not concluded from determining, in its own right, as to his qualifications to such seat.

THE JOINT ASSEMBLY HAD NO POWER TO ADJUDICATE UPON THE QUALIFICATIONS OF THE GOVERNOR TO A SEAT IN THE STATE SENATE, DID NOT ATTEMPT TO DO SO, BUT PROTESTED AGAINT HIS RIGHT.

The joint assembly for the purpose of electing a Senator had no power to judge of the right of the governor to a seat in the State senate; no power whatever resided in that body to judge of his qualifications, and his presence there and voting and presiding could not possibly have conferred any rights, even if there had been acquiescence on the part of the joint assembly. But there was no acquiescence, but, on the contrary, a vigorous protest.

The record shows (see affidavit of Senator Alrichs, supra) that he, on behalf of himself and fourteen other members of the joint assembly who had voted for Mr. Du Pont, presented in said joint assembly the following protest:

After the last ballot had been taken in said final joint assembly and before the houses separated I, on behalf of myself and the fourteen other senators voting for the said Henry A. Du Pont, arose and presented the following challenge, protest, and demand:

"I very respectfully challenge the correctness of the announcement of this vote and divers preceding votes, and do now most respectfully insist and demand that Henry A. Du Pont be now declared elected Senator for the unexpired term of six years commencing on the fourth day of March, A. D. 1895, inasmuch as it is now respectfully insisted that this joint assembly consists of twenty-nine members, the honorable gentleman now undertaking to preside and participate therein being governor of the State, and not now a senator."

After the presentation of the foregoing challenge, protest, and demand, and without taking any further ballot, the joint assembly finally separated, with a declaration from William T. Watson that no person had been elected Senator in Congress for said term.

SAMUEL ALRICHS.

Sworn and subscribed before me this 25th day of November, A. D. 1895. And witness my hand and official seal.

[SEAL.] JOHN H. FRAZER, Notary Public.

Even had Watson been senator and speaker of the senate on May 9, 1895, both de facto and de jure, he would not from these circumstances have had any preference right over that of any other member of the joint assembly to preside over that body. He would have been there simply as a senator, without any authority whatever in virtue of any law to preside, except by the consent of his associates. This consent was not given, but protested against.

THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES IS NOT CONCLUDED BY ANY CONSTRUCTION PLACED UPON THE CONSTITUTION OF THE STATE OF DELAWARE CONCERNING THE QUESTION AS TO WHETHER A CERTAIN SEAT IN THE SENATE IS, UNDER THE CONSTITUTION OF THAT STATE, OPEN TO OCCUPATION, AND THE RESULTANT RIGHT OF THE GOVERNOR TO OCCUPY SUCH SEAT.

But your committee respectfully insist that any judgment, either actual or constructive, of the Delaware senate as to the right of a person to a seat in such senate to be conclusive on the Senate of the United States, must relate to a seat in the senate subject to occupation.

The senate of the State of Delaware, while possessing the exclusive right to determine as to the qualifications of its members to all seats open to be filled, does not include the right or power upon the part of such senate to judge as to the number of seats in that body, or as to what shall constitute a constitutional vacancy, or a constitutional suspension of the right of a particular seat to be filled by anyone, either temporarily or permanently.

The authority given the senate in virtue of the constitutional provision is to judge of the qualifications of members who apply for admission to seats, which seats are provided for by the constitution, and not by the judgment of the senate.

If, therefore, the senate undertakes to determine either that there is a tenth place in the senate open to occupation by a member, and proceeds to fill that tenth place with a member, when the constitution declares that the senate shall consist of but nine members, or if it undertakes to declare that one of the nine seats is open to occupation, and proceeds to fill that seat, when the constitution declares that, by reason of the senator who occupied that seat having under the constitution become governor, such seat is not open to occupation, and can not be held or its functions exercised by such governor while he continues to hold and exercise the office of governor, then, in either of such cases, it is respectfully submitted, the judgment of the senate of the State of Delaware, however formal and solemn such a judgment may have been, does not conclude the Senate of the United States.

THE DISTINCTIONS BETWEEN THE DU PONT CASE AND THE TURPIE CASE.

The question for consideration here is widely different from that presented to this committee in the Turpie case, in the first session of the Fiftieth Congress.

In that case there was no statutory, much less constitutional, question involved as to the number of seats in the Indiana senate open to occupation. The rights of two sets of claimants to two different seats confessedly open to occupation were in issue. There was no question, constitutional, statutory, or otherwise, as to their right to be filled, or as to the duty upon the part of the senate to fill them, provided persons having the requisite qualifications were legally elected and returned. It was not only the right, but the duty of the Indiana senate, under the constitutional provisions in that State, to judge as to which set of claimants was legally elected and returned, and whether these had the proper qualifications. In the performance of this duty the Indiana senate held the two sitting members were not entitled to their seats and that the two persons claiming the same were, and the sitting members were ousted and the claimants seated. And this committee and the Senate very properly held that in such case the action of the State senate was conclusive.

Here the question rises to one of infinitely greater importance, involving an inquiry not only as to the qualifications of a person claiming a seat, but the question as to whether, under the constitution of the State of Delaware, there was any seat to be occupied. Argument to show the distinction between the two cases is unnecessary. The mere statement of the difference in the cases carries with it all the argument required.

But still further. In the Indiana case it was not questioned that the senate of Indiana had actually passed upon the question and judged actually of the right of the two claimants who were admitted to the seats to which they were admitted, while here it is clear there were no judgment of the senate of the State of Delaware, either actual or constructive, upon the right of the governor of the State of Delaware to hold or exercise the duties of senator.

THE SEAT FILLED BY GOVERNOR WATSON IN THE STATE SENATE OF DELAWARE, MAY 9, 1895, WAS NOT, IN ANY CORRECT INTERPRETATION OF THE DELAWARE CONSTITUTION, OPEN TO OCCUPATION ON THAT DATE.

It is clear, if under the constitution of the State of Delaware, as your committee believe it is, that one of two things is true: Either that the office of senator held by Mr. Watson become absolutely vacant on his accession to the office of governor, or otherwise, that his right to exercise the functions of senator was held in abeyance and absolutely suspended for and during the time he should continue to exercise the functions of governor; then in the former case there was a vacancy in the office of senator which could only be filled by election, and the right of the governor to fill it was one not open to the consideration or determination of the senate, because that matter is already determined by the constitution, while in the latter case there is by the provisions of the constitution no seat open to occupation. It can not in such case be filled by anyone, much less by the governor, and if the senate undertakes to fill it, either with the governor or anyone else, it is a judgment that is ultra vires and does not conclude the Senate of the United States.

In this connection it may be conceded that instances might occur where the judgment of a State senate as to the qualifications of one of its members may be binding on the Senate of the United States, although confessedly the effect of such judgment may be to admit a person to a seat who is lacking in an essential qualification. But it proceeds upon the theory that when certain facts are found to exist, although such finding may be erroneous, the judgment is binding. As, for instance, the constitution of the State of Delaware prescribes as a qualification for State senator that he shall be 27 years of age. Suppose the senate admit a person to a seat in the senate who, as a matter of fact, is but 20 years of age, but there is nothing in the record, nothing in the judgment of the senate passing upon his qualifications that discloses the fact that he was but 20 years of age; in such case, it is believed, the judgment of the senate would conclude the United States Senate. But in such case, suppose the record, the judgment of the senate upon the question of qualification, found as a fact that the applicant was but 20 years of age, and then on such finding admitted him to a seat, is it not entirely clear that such a judgment would not be conclusive upon this body?

But three other States—namely, Pennsylvania, Maine, and Colorado—have ever had constitutions embracing in corresponding provisions the same qualifying words of the Delaware constitution, namely, "during his continuance in office." Therefore it is that in those States only can we look for judicial decisions or authorities on the question whether Governor Watson can exercise the office of senator during his incumbency of the office of governor.

On the 14th of January, 1830, Joshua Hall was chosen president of the Maine senate. Soon thereafter the governor died, and he became the governor. Sixteen senators, including Mr. Hall, had been admitted and sworn. On the 26th of January the senate decided that there were four vacancies. Under the constitution these vacancies were to be filled by a joint assembly of the two houses of the legislature. On February — the house of representatives sent a message to the senate requesting that body to meet the house in joint assembly for the election of senators to fill the vacancies. On the 2d of February, the senate being in session, a senator moved an adjournment to enable the senate to meet the representatives in joint assembly. Mr. Hall, who was then exercising the office of governor, appeared in the senate and claimed the right to act as president. The vote was taken by yeas and nays. Hall voted in the negative. His vote being counted the result was, yeas 8, nays 8, and the motion was lost. On the 13th of February Mr. Jonathan G. Hunton, having been in the meantime elected governor, submitted certain questions to the supreme court in pursuance of the Maine constitution. One of these questions was the following:

2d. Has the president of the senate, when the office of governor is vacant, and when he ought to be acting as governor, a right to preside and vote at the senate board?

The answer to this question was given by the chief justice, with the concurrence of the other justices, in the following words:

As to the second question, my opinion is that while the president of the senate, in virtue of his office as such, is clothed with the power of exercising the office of governor, he has no right to preside over the senate or to vote as a member of that body. (Opinion of the justices, 7 Greenleaf, 483.)

The provision of the Maine constitution, it will be seen, is in substance and effect, in fact almost literally, similar to that of the Delaware constitution.

It is as follows:

ART. IV. SEC. 14. Whenever the office of governor shall become vacant by death, resignation, removal from office, or otherwise, the president of the senate shall exercise the office of governor until another governor shall be qualified.

There is a provision of the Maine constitution which to some extent impairs, but by no means destroys, the value of the decision of the Maine court, supra, as an authority in the case now under consideration. It is to the effect that while the president of the senate exercises the office of governor, his duties as president of the senate shall be suspended and a president pro tempore elected. The provision is not that his powers and duties as president of the senate shall be suspended, but merely that his duties as such shall be suspended. It is very clear, of course, that if a man's power to perform certain acts is suspended, his obligation to perform them must also be suspended. He can not be charged with the obligation while stripped of the power to perform them. But it is not so clear that the suspension of the obligation is also the suspension of his power to perform the acts. He may have the power without being required to exercise it, except at his discretion or convenience. It is not clear that the suspension of the obligation to act as president of the Maine senate did not leave it in the power of the officer, to perform or not perform, at his discretion or convenience, the duties not of senator, but of president of the senate.

But if this peculiar provision of the Maine constitution does, in truth, suspend the acting governor's power and duty to preside over the senate, it certainly does not suspend or purport to suspend his power, or his duty, to vote as senator. If his power or duty to vote as senator is suspended, it must be suspended by some other provision of the State constitution. That other provision is to be found in a clause, which is common to both the Maine and the Delaware constitutions, to the effect that "no person holding any office under the State, shall, during his continuance in office, be a senator or representative." And this gives great value and weight to the Maine decision as an authority in the case under consideration, for it makes the Maine case and the Delaware case, so far as this point is concerned, closely analagous. The prohibition against voting as senator is the same in both constitutions.

The following is the provision of the Maine constitution, which suspends the duty of the governor to preside over the senate:

ART. 4. SEC. 14. Whenever the office of governor shall become vacant by death, resignation, removal from office, or otherwise, the president of the senate shall exercise the office of governor until another governor shall be duly qualified: and, in case of the death, resignation, removal from office, or other disqualification of the president of the senate so exercising the office of governor, the speaker of the house of representatives shall exercise the office until a president of the senate shall have been chosen; and when the office of governor, president of the senate, and speaker of the house shall become vacant, in the recess of the senate, the person acting as secretary of state for the time being shall, by proclamation, convene the senate, that a president may be chosen to exercise the office of governor. And whenever either the president of the senate or speaker of the house shall so exercise said office, he shall receive only the compensation of governor; but his duties as president or speaker shall be suspended; and the senate or house shall fill the vacancy until his duties as governor shall cease.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL STATUS OF THE OFFICE OF A DELAWARE SENATOR WHO HAS SUCCEEDED TO THE OFFICE OF GOVERNOR IS ESSENTIALLY THE SAME AS THAT OF THE OFFICE OF A SENATOR OR REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS DURING THE INTERVAL BETWEEN THE 4TH OF MARCH, THE COMMENCEMENT OF HIS TERM, AND THE DATE OF HIS RESIGNATION OF ANOTHER FEDERAL OFFICE HELD BY HIM AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF HIS TERM.

The constitutional status of the office of a Delaware senator who has succeeded to the office of governor would seem to be essentially the same as that of the office of a Senator or Representative in Congress during the interval between the 4th of March, the commencement of his term, and the date of his resignation of another Federal office held by him at the commencement of his term. In each case the office is in abeyance whether it be characterized as a temporary vacancy or as a suspension. If in one case the office of State senator remains in abeyance during the State senator's continuance in the office of governor, so in the other case does the office of Federal Senator or Representative remain in abeyance during the Federal Senator's or Representative's continuance in the prior Federal office.

It is true that in one case the prior office has been actually exercised, while in the other it has not. But this difference would not seem to affect the principle involved, for the following reasons:

First. The constitutions of Delaware and the United States are, on this point, substantially identical. The words of the Delaware constitution are—

No * * * person holding any office under * * * this State shall, during his continuance * * * in office, be a senator or representative.

The following is the corresponding clause of the Federal Constitution:

No person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office.

Second. The seat in the Delaware senate which had been occupied by the governor must, during his incumbency of the latter office, be either (1) subject to occupation, or (2) absolutely vacant, or (3) in abeyance. There is no other possible status of the senatorial office from which the speaker of the senate is transferred to the office of governor. So also the seat of the Federal Senator or Representative must, during the interval between the 4th of March and his resignation of his other office, be either (1) subject to occupation, or (2) absolutely vacant, or (3) in abeyance. If the office of the State senator is subject to occupation by the governor while he is governor, so also is the office of Senator or Representative in Congress subject to occupation by the holder of another Federal office while he holds such office. If the office of Federal Senator or Representative becomes absolutely and permanently vacant, so also does the office of State senator become absolutely vacant. If the office of the Federal Senator or Representative is in abeyance, and the right to exercise it suspended, so also is the office of the State senator in abeyance, and the right to exercise it suspended.

The law provides for the payment of the salaries of the Federal Representatives from the commencement of their terms on the 4th of March. This means that they hold their office from that date, provided they hold no other Federal office. But they are not sworn and do not exercise their office until Congress meets after the lapse of eight months. If they hold other Federal offices on or after March 4, their office of Representative is not absolutely vacated, but is only placed in abeyance. It is then in abeyance for precisely the same reason for which the office of State senator is in abeyance when he exercises the office of governor. In each case the office is in abeyance because of the temporary exercise of another office. The Federal Representative may not be sworn until the expiration of eight months after his term begins. But the oath does not confer the office. It is not a prerequisite to the tenure of the office. It is only a prerequisite to the exercise of the office.

The decisions of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, fixing the status of the office of Senator or Representative during the interval between the 4th of March and the resignation of another Federal office held on that day, will therefore be valuable authorities for the case now under consideration.

James H. Lane was chosen United States Senator by the Kansas legislature in April, 1861. On the 20th of June, 1861, he was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers by the President, and he accepted the office. On the 4th of July, 1861, he took his seat in the Senate, having previously resigned the office of brigadier-general. On the 8th of July, 1861, the governor of Kansas, assuming that Mr. Lane's acceptance of the office of brigadier-general had vacated his office of Senator, appointed Frederic P. Stanton to fill the vacancy. Mr. Stanton presented his credentials and claimed the seat, but the Senate awarded the seat to Mr. Lane. Numerous cases in the National House of Representatives are to the same effect and recognize the same principle.

NO QUESTION OF FACT IN THIS CASE UPON WHICH THE DELAWARE SENATE WAS CALLED UPON TO ACT.

In the case under consideration there is no question of fact upon which the Delaware senate could act or did act, and which action, although erroneous, would conclude the Senate of the United States; upon the contrary, the senate, assuming for the present it passed judgment on the qualifications of Watson, and taking the facts as they were and are, open, notorious, conceded by all, and disclosed as well by the journals of the senate, and in reference to which there can be no dispute, namely, that Senator and Speaker Watson was then governor, essayed to place him in a seat in the senate which the constitution on these conceded facts declares to be not subject to occupation, any more than would be a tenth seat in the senate when the constitution declares the senate shall consist of but nine members. Hence this is such a judgment, it is believed, as is not binding on the United States Senate. The Senate is not concluded by such a judgment any more than it would be concluded by a judgment which on its face disclosed the fact that the senate of the State of Delaware had on the 9th day of May, 1895, instead of admitting Governor Watson to a seat, had admitted President Cleveland or a tenth member to that body.

While it is the exclusive right of the senate of Delaware to determine, or, in the language of the constitution, judge, as to the qualifications of a senator, this does not include the right or power on the part of such senate to declare the kind or number of qualifications a person must have to entitle him to a seat in the senate. These are determined by the constitution itself. The senate can neither add to nor detract from them, can neither increase, reduce, nor modify their number or character. What the senate can do, what it has a constitutional right to do, is to judge whether a particular person is possessed of the qualifications which the constitution and the statutes have prescribed. Hence it is if the constitution declare that a certain person for any reason is ineligible to a seat in the senate, and the judgment of the senate discloses on its face this fact of constitutional ineligibility, and the senate thus admits to a seat a person whom the constitution declares is debarred, then such judgment, however formal or solemn, it is submitted, does not conclude the Senate of the United States.

As bearing upon and in support of this view, your committee attract attention to the following authorities:

AUTHORITIES.

In Prouty v. Stover (11 Kans., 235) the validity of the election of a State printer by a joint assembly of the Kansas legislature was assailed. The question arose whether the action of the State senate, admitting and retaining certain senators, was made conclusive of their right to sit in the senate and vote in the joint assembly by the constitutional provision which made each house "the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." This action of the senate practically construed the law of Kansas to recognize certain seats in the senate as subject to occupation. It was claimed that this was conclusive on the courts. But the court held that the power of the senate to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members did not include the power to conclusively construe the law to recognize the seats as subject to occupation, or to admit or retain the occupants of those seats. Judge Brewer, now an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

Defendants claim that this court can not look beyond the action of the house to inquire whether persons, admitted as members, were legally entitled to seats. Article 2, section 8, declares that each house "shall be judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." Its determination is not the subject of repeal or review. It is final and concludes everyone. But what is concluded in this power? Does the power to judge of the qualifications of its members include the power to increase such membership? Can it enlarge its members without limit? Is it like an academy of science, or a lodge of Odd Fellows, capable of indefinite expansion? If the law fixed the number of senators at twenty-five, could those twenty-five admit twenty-five more, on pretense of judging "of the elections and qualifications of its own members," and thus create a senate of fifty members? If this power exists, how easily could a partisan majority secure to itself a two-thirds vote by simply admitting new members. To create a representative or senatorial district requires a law—the consent of both houses. Neither house, by itself, can create a district and then admit someone to represent it. The district must exist before it can be represented.

In State v. Francis (26 Kans., 724) it was contended that a certain act of the legislature had failed to receive a constitutional majority of votes, and was, therefore, void.

The question was whether four of the representatives whose votes were decisive in favor of this act, in the house, were lawful members of that body. The house of representatives, by its action admitting and retaining these four members, had construed the law and constitution to recognize their seats as subject to occupation at the time. The court overruled this construction, held that there were no seats in the house for these four representatives, and declared the act in question to be void. The court said:

Therefore, whenever the house of representatives consists of more than one hundred and twenty-five members some of such members must be there illegally. Such was the case in 1879. The house of representatives, at that time, consisted of one hundred and twenty-nine members. Four of these members, to wit, the four from Rooks, Rush, Harper, and Kingman counties, who were not provided for by law, and who were the last members admitted to seats, were not entitled to their seats. And the act in controversy was passed only by the assistance of their votes. Except for their votes, or at least three of their votes, the act would not have received a constitutional majority of the votes of the members of the house; and, not counting their votes, the act did not receive a constitutional majority. Now, we do not think that their votes should be counted; and, therefore, we think the act in controversy must be held as not having passed the house of representatives, and as void.

In Yard v. Meeser (44 Pa. St., 341) the common council of Philadelphia, which was invested with the power to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members, had construed the law to recognize two seats as subject to occupation by representatives of the Fifth Ward, and had admitted a second member from that ward. The court, in an action to restrain the payment of the salary of the second councilman from this ward, overruled the construction given to the law by the common council, held that the law did not recognize the second seat, and declared that its occupant was not a lawful member of the common council. The court said:

This court has no authority to judge whether the election was regularly conducted or not, for that duty is assigned by law to the councils. Our duty must be confined to the decision of the question whether there was an office or vacancy to be filled.

Judge Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations, pages 52–55, says:

It follows, therefore, that every Department of the Government, and every official of every Department, may, at any time when a duty is to be performed, be required to pass upon a question of constitutional construction. Sometimes the case will be such that the decision when made must from the very nature of things be conclusive and subject to no repeal or review, however erroneous it may be in the opinion of other Departments or of other officers; but in other cases the same question may be required to be passed upon again before the duty is completely performed. The first of these classes is where by the Constitution a particular question is plainly addressed to the discretion of some one Department or officer, so that the interference of any other Department or officer, with a view to the substitution of its own discretion or judgment, in the place of that to which the Constitution has confided the decision, would be impertinent and intrusive. * * * But there are cases in which the question of construction is equally addressed to two or more Departments of the Government; and it then becomes important to know whether the decision by one is binding upon the others, or whether each is to act upon its own judgment. * * * But setting aside now those cases to which we have referred, when from the nature of things, and perhaps from explicit terms of the Constitution, the judgment of the Department or officer acting must be final, we shall find the general rule to be that, whenever action is taken which may become the subject of a suit or proceeding in court, any question of constitutional power or right that was involved in such action will be open for consideration in such suit or proceeding, and, as the court must finally settle the particular controversy, so also will they finally determine the question of constitutional law.

This is a case, therefore, if there can be said to be any question open to construction, in which, in the language of Judge Cooley, "the question of construction is equally addressed to two or more Departments of the Government." It is in all respects similar in principle to that class of cases referred to by this eminent jurist wherein action is taken which may become the subject of a suit or proceeding in court. Any question of constitutional power or right that was involved in such action will be open for consideration in such suit or proceeding, and the court must finally settle the particular controversy; so also will they determine the question of constitutional law. Here the Senate of the United States, being called to act judicially under the constitutional grant authorizing it to judge of the elections and qualifications of its members—and this necessarily involves a construction of the Delaware constitution—hence, it is not bound, it is respectfully submitted, by any judgment of the Delaware senate on that subject.

If, as a matter of constitutional law, the office of senator and speaker of the senate held by Watson became absolutely vacant when he succeeded to the executive office, any judgment of the State senate seeking to clothe him with power to hold or exercise the office of State senator would be a mere brutum fulmen, an act in all respects ultra vires, for the plain reason it would be a judgment assigning him a seat in the senate which, under the constitution, is not assignable or subject to occupation. Such an act upon the part of the Delaware senate would be something infinitely more in scope and effect than simply to judge of the qualifications of a person to a seat in the senate. It would be to declare a seat subject to occupation which the constitution declares shall not be occupied.

And this view is equally applicable to this case whether the office of senator becomes absolutely vacant on the speaker of the senate becoming governor, or whether the right to exercise the office of senator while exercising the office of governor is merely held in abeyance and suspended. And any such judgment, it is respectfully submitted, is not binding on the Senate of the United States, and can not deprive that body under its power to judge of the qualifications of its members of determining whether under the constitution of the State of Delaware the governor of that State can be permitted to hold or exercise the office of senator at the same time he holds and exercises the office of governor.

AT COMMON LAW THE SAME PERSON SHALL NOT HOLD OR EXERCISE SIMULTANEOUSLY INCOMPATIBLE OFFICES.

In support of our first proposition that it is a well-settled rule of the common law that the same person shall not exercise simultaneously incompatible offices, and, further, that the acceptance of an office incompatible with the one held is ipso facto a resignation of the other, we attract attention to the following authorities:

In the case of Milward v. Thatcher (2 T. R., 81) it was held that accepting the office of town clerk vacated the office of jurat of the corporation of Hastings, although the office of clerk was inferior to that of jurat, the jurats sitting as judges of a court of record; and the court, Mr. Justice Bulwer, in announcing the opinion said:

Now, if the offices be incompatible, his being a jurat before is no objection to his election; and if they be incompatible, the election to the latter office is good, because the acceptance of the second vacates the first office. * * * The case of The King v. Sir W. Trelawney, so far as the question was entered into, is an authority. There the court did not distinguish between a superior and inferior office; but Lord Mansfield expressly said that "if the two offices were incompatible, the acceptance of the latter would imply a surrender of the former."

Mr. Justice Bulwer further, in the opinion in that case, said:

If two offices can not be held by the same person at the same time, the acceptance of the latter office vacates the former.

In The King v. Pateman (2 Durnf. and East, 777) Lord Chief Justice Kenyon said:

If an alderman be also a magistrate, and the town clerk act ministerially under him, then, indeed, these two offices can not be held by the same person. Now, here is a question whether the town clerk's accounts are not allowed by the alderman; if they are, I think the two offices are incompatible, and this information should be for the purpose of trying that fact.

In The King v. Tizzard (9 B. and C., 418) Mr. Justice Bailey gives the following as one definition of incompatible offices:

The two offices are incompatible when the holder can not in every instance discharge the duties of each.

And further says Mr. Justice Bailey:

The acceptance of the second office therefore vacates the first. So a man shall lose his office if he accepts another office incompatible.

Can it be said that any man can in every instance discharge the duties of both governor and state senator, much less those of governor, senator, and speaker of the senate.

Chief Justice Appleton, in Stubbs v. Lee (64 Me., 195), decided in 1874, in discussing what constituted incompatible offices, and also the effect of the acceptance of an office incompatible with one already held, referred to the common-law doctrine, and citing the foregoing English authorities, says:

"The offices in question must be regarded as incompatible. I think," remarks Bailey, J., in The King v. Tizzard (9 B. and C., 418), "that the two offices are incompatible when the holder can not in every instance discharge the duties of each. * * * The acceptance of the second office therefore vacates the first. * * * So a man shall lose his office if he accepts another office incompatible; as if one be under the control of the other; as if the remembrancer of the exchequer be made a baron of the exchequer." (5 Com. Dig., tit. "Officer" (K. 5).) The appointment of a person to a second office incompatible with the first is not absolutely void, but on his subsequently accepting the appointment and qualifying, the first office is ipso facto vacated. (The People v. Carrique, 2 Hill, 93.)

A vacancy may arise in an office from an implied resignation, as by the incumbent's accepting an incompatible office (Van Orsdale v. Hazard, 3 Hill, 243). The acceptance of the office of constable of a town by a person holding at the time the office of justice of the peace is of itself a surrender of the latter office (Magie v. Stoddard, 25 Conn., 565).

Mr. Justice Appleton, in further discussing this question in case supra, says:

Where one has two incompatible offices, both can not be retained. The public has a right to know which is held and which is surrendered. It should not be left to chance or to the uncertain and fluctuating whim of the office-holder to determine. The general rule, therefore, that the acceptance of and qualification for an office incompatible with one then held is a resignation of the former is one certain and reliable as well as one indispensable for the protection of the public.

The defendant having been appointed and sworn as a deputy sheriff must be regarded as having accepted that office. By that acceptance he surrendered the office of trial justice, a judicial office incompatible with that of a deputy sheriff. His judicial authority, therefore, as a trial justice was at an end.

Justice Cowen in discussing the question as to the effect of the acceptance of one office upon the other, in The People v. Carrique (2 Hill, 97), says:

This is an absolute determination of the original office, and leaves no shadow of title to the possessor, so that neither quo warranto nor a motion is necessary before any other may be elected (vide Millcock on Municipal Corporations, 240, pl. 617; to the same point Lord Mansfield, in Rex v. Trelawney, 3 Burr., 1616; Butler, J., in Milward v. Thatcher, 2 T. R., 87).

Also in Van Orsdall v. Hazard (3 Hill, 248) the court said:

A vacancy sometimes arises from a mere implied resignation by accepting an office incompatible with that which is claimed to be vacated.

THE AMERICAN RULE IS THAT LEGISLATIVE AND EXECUTIVE OFFICES ARE INCOMPATIBLE.

Your committee recognize the doctrine as enunciated in the foregoing authorities as being the well-settled common law and American rule upon the subject of incompatible offices, both as to what constitutes incompatibility and as to the effect of the acceptance of an incompatible office in operating ipso facto a resignation of the former. A vacancy in such case is at once created, and it is not necessary there should be any legislative or judicial declaration to that effect. It is such a vacancy as may be filled at once by the proper appointing power. And your committee further hold that the American rule is that legislative and executive offices are incompatible; that this general rule, so far from being weakened, is strengthened and confirmed by the fact that in a number of instances, for special reasons, the same person, and sometimes the same legislative body, is, by specific constitutional or legislative provision, clothed partially with both legislative and executive powers.

John M. Clayton, a leading and influential member, as stated by counsel in their brief in opposition to Mr. Du Pont, of the constitutional convention of the State of Delaware of 1831, recognized and strongly urged recognition of this doctrine by that convention. He said:

I have a high opinion of the senators as men; but I object to the principle of conferring on them executive powers. It is highly important to keep as distinct as possible the legislative and executive departments. This principle is recognized in all our bills of rights. But here we should be blending legislative and executive powers.

THERE IS NO EXPRESS OR IMPLIED AUTHORITY IN THE DELAWARE CONSTITUTION FOR THE SIMULTANEOUS EXERCISE BY THE SAME PERSON OF THE OFFICES OF GOVERNOR AND STATE SENATOR.

There is no express or implied authority in the Delaware constitution for the simultaneous exercise by the same person of the offices of governor and senator. On the contrary, the constitution expressly inhibits such exercise of those two offices, and therefore, at the time Mr. Du Pont received 15 votes in the joint convention, Mr. Watson being then governor of the State, holding and exercising that executive office, was incapable of exercising the office of senator.

Section 12 of Article II of the Delaware constitution, among other things, provides as follows:

SEC. 12. * * * No person concerned in any army or navy contracts, nor member of Congress, nor any person holding any office under this State or the United States, except the attorney-general, officers usually appointed by the courts of justice, respectively, attorneys at law, and officers in the militia holding no disqualifying office, shall, during his continuance in Congress, or in office, be a senator or representative.

Your committee regard this provision as absolutely disqualifying the governor of the State of Delaware, whether elected by the people or having succeeded to the office to fill a vacancy caused by the death of the governor, from being a senator, or from exercising any of the functions of a senator. The provision is clear and specific, open to no ambiguity in its declaration that no person holding any office under the State, or of the United States, with certain exceptions, which are stated, shall "during his continuance in such office be a senator or representative."

Mr. Watson was, on the 9th day of May, 1895, confessedly the governor of the State of Delaware. He was therefore on that date holding an office under the State of Delaware. As the governor is not named in the exceptions, namely, "the attorney-general, officers usually appointed by the courts of justice, respectively, attorneys at law, and officers in the militia holding no disqualifying office," he was therefore disqualified from being a senator in the senate of the State on that date. In other words, there was a place made vacant in the senate, either absolutely, or for and during the time the speaker of the senate should continue to exercise the office of governor, which, by express constitutional provision, he, the governor of the State, was prohibited from filling—a vacancy such as was open only to occupation, if at all, by a person elected by the qualified electors of Kent County.

But not only so. It is further provided, in section 5 of Article III of the Delaware constitution, as follows:

SEC. 5. No member of Congress nor person holding office under the United States or this State shall exercise the office of governor.

What is the effect of this provision? Is it not clear, unambiguous, specific, to the effect, among other things, that no person holding any office under the State of Delaware shall exercise the office of governor; or, in other words, no senator (because a senator holds an office under the State) shall be governor or shall exercise the office of governor?

A senator under the constitution of Delaware may be and is by specific provision eligible to the office of governor, but once the office of governor is accepted, its duties entered upon by such senator, he unquestionably, in virture of section 12 of Article II of the Delaware constitution, ceases to be a senator either absolutely or by suspension.

He ceases to be a senator for two reasons:

(1) Because section 12, Article II, of the constitution declares that no person holding office under that State (and the governor holds office under the State) shall be a senator; and

(2) Because the moment he becomes governor he necessarily—the two offices being incompatible—ceases to be senator. Otherwise, moreover, under section 5 of Article III of the constitution, he can not, if he is a senator, exercise the office of governor.

There is no conflict or repugnance between these two clauses of the constitution of the State of Delaware, unless an unreasonable construction should be given to them. Should they be construed as to make one, a declaration that the senator who happens to be speaker of the senate when the governor dies shall thereupon become governor, and the other a declaration that no senator shall ever become governor, then there would be a repugnance and a gross incongruity. Such a construction, therefore, should not be given if they are susceptible of another construction more reasonable and which would harmonize the two provisions.

In the judgment of your committee the two clauses taken together mean simply this:

In the event of a vacancy in the office of governor, the speaker of the senate is eligible to become governor. He is not empowered to exercise the office of governor ex officio, but he is eligible to fill the office of governor. If he takes the oath and enters upon the duties of the office of governor, then he ceases to be senator, if not absolutely, by suspension for such time as he shall exercise the office of governor, because the constitution declares, in substance and effect, that inasmuch as he then holds the office of governor, that being an office under the State, he can no longer, at least not so long as he continues to exercise the office of governor, be a senator.

The constitution of Delaware, taken as a whole, maintains with great distinctness the lines of separation between the three great branches of government—legislative, executive, and judicial—and this upon the well-recognized principle in America that legislative, executive, and judicial offices are incompatible with each other, and are not to be exercised simultaneously by the same person. While in a few instances there is slight encroachment in one sphere of these branches upon another, there is no instance in which the constitution authorizes the same individual to exercise the power of governor and that of either judge or legislator simultaneously.

This general rule and requirement of the constitution of that State as keeping distinct and separate the three branches of government are but emphasized and strengthened by the exceptions provided for in the constitution, as, for instance, it is provided that in case of a tie vote in the election of a governor by the people the two houses of the legislature are by joint ballot to choose one of the candidates to be governor.

Again, contested elections of governor are to be determined by a joint committee of one-third of all the members of each branch of the legislature.

Again, each house of the legislature is made the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

And still further, all impeachments are to be tried by the senate.

But still further, section 14 of Article III of the Delaware constitution provides, as we have seen, that—

Upon any vacancy happening in the office of governor by his death, etc., * * * the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified.

There is nothing in this clause or any other clause of the constitution which declares affirmatively or by fair inference that the person thus exercising the office of governor shall continue to exercise the office of speaker or of senator.

SOME ADDITIONAL CITATIONS FROM THE DELAWARE CONSTITUTION SHOWING THE INCOMPATIBILITY OF THE OFFICES OF GOVERNOR AND STATE SENATOR.

For instance, Article VI, section 14, provides that—

The governor may, for any reasonable cause, in his discretion, remove any of them (judges) on the address of two-thirds of all the members of each branch of the general assembly.

If the governor can be governor and senator at the same time, exercising both offices simultaneously, then he may be one of the senators making up the two-thirds of all the members of each branch of the general assembly to address the governor, in virtue of which address alone he as governor acquires jurisdiction to remove a judge.

Again, Article III, section 11, provides that the governor—

Shall, from time to time, give to the general assembly information of affairs concerning the State, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge expedient.

It would be rather an anomaly in our American system of government to permit a governor to vote in favor of measures in the senate which he as governor deemed expedient and had recommended to the senate.

But still further, Article III, section 12, provides that the governor may—

In case of disagreement between the two houses with respect to the time of adjournment, adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper, not exceeding three months.

Hence it is, if the governor can also be senator at the same time, and exercise both offices simultaneously, he is clothed with power to create a disagreement between the two houses by his vote in the senate, which fact alone would give him jurisdiction as governor to adjourn the general assembly to such time as he should think proper.

Article III, section 1, provides as follows:

The supreme executive powers of the State shall be vested in a governor.

While, therefore, the constitution designates the speaker of the senate as an eligible person to fill the office of governor, and as the person to fill it in the event of a vacancy, it is clear he can not and does not fill the office as senator, or because of the fact that he is speaker of the senate, for the reason that the supreme executive powers of the State are by the constitution vested in a governor and not in the speaker of the senate.

Again, it is provided in Article V, section 1, that—

All impeachments shall be tried by the senate; and when sitting for that purpose the senators shall be upon oath or affirmation to do justice according to the evidence. No person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of all the senators.

The governor, moreover, is, in virtue of this same article, subject to impeachment by the house of representatives. If Watson was governor on May 9, 1895, and is yet, and this is conceded, then he was and is liable to impeachment, and under the theory that he is still senator, and eligible as such to exercise the functions of senator, he would sit in judgment on himself, and by his vote might defeat a two-thirds vote in the senate and thus render a verdict of not guilty as impeached. Can such incompatibility in office receive the sanction of the Senate?

Article II, section 7, provides:

Each house may * * * with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member.

While Article III, section 14, provides that—

The governor shall not be removed from his office for inability, but with the concurrence of two-thirds of all the members of each branch of the legislature.

Here again, if permitted to exercise the office of senator while exercising the office of governor, he may by his vote in the senate defeat a two-thirds vote necessary to remove him as governor for disability.

It is also provided, in Article II, section 16, of the Delaware constitution, that—

In case of vacancy in the office of State treasurer in the recess of the general assembly, either through omission of the general assembly to appoint, or by the death, removal out of the State, resignation, or inability of the State treasurer, * * * the governor shall fill the vacancy by appointment to continue until the next meeting of the general assembly.

It is obviously obnoxious to all sense of governmental propriety to permit a governor in such case to act as a legislator, and thus by his vote, and, what is infinitely more potent, by his executive influence in the senate, defeat the election of the head of the exchequer in the State, and thus enable him to appoint a man of his sole choice to the office.

Again, Article VII, section 1, provides that—

Certain officers * * * may be removed * * * on the address of both houses of the legislature—

While Article VI, section 14, provides that—

The governor may for any reasonable cause in his discretion remove any of the judges on the address of two-thirds of all the members of each branch of the general assembly.

Here, again, the gross impropriety is made clearly apparent in recognizing a construction that will enable the governor of the State to exercise his vote and his influence as governor of the State in the State senate in making up the two-thirds vote that will enable him as governor to remove or appoint judges and a number of other officers of the State.

WHAT HAS BEEN THE USAGE AND WHAT ARE THE PRECEDENTS?

While in the judgment of your committee there is no such uncertainty or ambiguity in the different provisions of the constitution as to require resort to usage or precedents in giving construction, it is well to consider just what the precedents and usage have been.

Since 1792 nine speakers of the senate and one speaker of the house of representatives have succeeded to the office of governor pursuant to the provisions of section 14 of Article III of the Delaware constitutions of 1792 and 1831. Four of these were under the constitution of 1792 and six under the constitution of 1831—the present constitution.

In not one of these ten cases cited has any person who has succeeded to the governorship in the last one hundred and four years in virtue of this section 14, which, so far as this question is concerned, is substantially similar in the constitutions of 1792 and 1831, whether speaker of the senate or speaker of the house of representatives, taken any part whatever during his continuance in the governor's office in the proceedings of the senate or of the house of representatives, with the single exception of the present governor of Delaware, Mr. Watson, and whose act in thus breaking over the precedents of one hundred years' standing, has involved the people and the legislature of the State of Delaware and the Senate of the United States in this controversy. During all this time the ten persons, including Governor Watson, thus exercising the office of governor have during such time drawn the governor's salary and have not drawn the salary of senator or member.

THE FACT THAT THE DELAWARE CONSTITUTION PROVIDES FOR THE ELECTION OF A SPEAKER pro tempore OF THE SENATE WHEN THE SPEAKER SUCCEEDS TO THE GOVERNORSHIP DOES NOT IMPLY THAT THE LATTER CONTINUES TO BE SPEAKER OF THE SENATE.

Counsel in opposition to the claim of Mr. Du Pont contend that the use of the words, "speaker pro tempore," in the clause of the Delaware constitution which provides "That either house whose speaker shall exercise the office of governor may choose a speaker pro tempore," carries with it the implication of the contemporaneous official existence of another speaker, and it is also contended that the use of the words, "may choose," in the latter part of such clause, implies simply a discretion in, and not a duty upon, the part of the senate to elect a speaker pro tempore in such a case.

Your committee can not concede either of these propositions as the result of a proper legal construction of such provision, even if the provision stood alone, and still much more difficult would it be to consent to such a construction when considered, as the clause must be, in connection with other clauses of the constitution. And as bearing upon the latter proposition it may be properly said that inasmuch as the public interests are involved, it being unquestionably for the public interest that the senate should at all times have a presiding officer, and as it is plain to all that the governor of a State if he would properly discharge the duties of executive, could not possibly, in the very nature of things, for any part of the time, much less at all times be present and preside over the senate, it follows, under the well-settled rule of law, that the word "may," as used in that clause, should be construed as "shall."

"The rule is," said the court in Rex vs. Inhabitants of Derby (Skinner, 370), and in Rex et Regina vs. Barlow (2 Salkeld, 609), "where a constitution or a statute directs the doing of a thing for the sake of justice or the public good the word 'may' is the same as the word 'shall.'"

This rule has been followed both in England and the United States without any respectable dissent.

A statute of Illinois reads as follows: "The board of supervisors may, if deemed advisable, levy a special tax," etc., and the Supreme Court of the United States, in construing this statute in the case of Supervisors vs. The United States (4 Wall., 435), opinion by Mr. Justice Swayne, said:

The conclusion to be deduced from the authorities is that where power is given to public officers in the language of the act before us, or in equivalent language, where the public interest or individual rights call for its exercise, the language, though permissive in form is in fact peremptory.

In Steines vs. Franklin Co. (48 Mo., 167), the court held that when a statute provides that the county court "may" submit the question to the voters, before incurring certain expenses, it must do so. In Mitchell vs. Duncan (7 Flor., 12), it is held that "may" is construed "shall" where a statute directs the doing of a thing necessary to the ends of justice.

In People v. Brooklyn (22 Barb., 404) it is held that "may" will be construed "shall," where the good sense of the entire enactment requires it. In Mayor v. New York (3 Hill, 612), the Supreme Court said:

Where a public body, or officer, has been clothed, by statute, with power to do an act which concerns the public interest, or the rights of third persons, the execution of the power may be insisted on as a duty, though the phraseology of the statute be permissive merely.

The theory that provision in a statute or constitution for the election of a speaker pro tempore implies the existence at the same time of another speaker is wholly dissipated by the precedents of the innumerable American instances of the election of a speaker pro tempore when there is no regular speaker. A speaker pro tempore is simply a speaker for the occasion—for the time being. There may or may not be another speaker in existence at the same time. A speaker pro tempore may be, and frequently is, chosen, and so designated and called when there is no other speaker. There is, therefore, no argument in opposition to the theory of this report to be drawn from the use in the provision quoted, either of the words "may choose" or pro tempore.

To hold the same person could exercise and discharge the duties and functions of governor and State senator and speaker of the senate simultaneously would be to strike down ruthlessly the line that separates the executive and legislative branches of the Government and to declare a union of these two branches in the same person. This could not be so under the well-recognized American rule, even in the absence of express prohibitory clauses; but in this case such prohibitory clauses exist, as we have shown.

The constitutional provision is not that no person holding any office under the State of Delaware shall be elected governor by the people, but that no person holding such office shall "exercise the office of governor."

It is quite immaterial how he comes to be governor, whether by election by the people or by virtue of the constitutional provision making the speaker of the senate eligible in a certain contingency; in either case it is considered he is the governor of the State, in every conceivable sense of the term, and hence it is clear he can not, while exercising such office of governor, hold any other office under the State of Delaware. He therefore can not be a senator; he can not exercise senatorial functions while exercising executive functions.

The court of errors and appeals of the State of Delaware, in the case of Rice vs. Foster (4 Harrington, 485–487), drew with clearness and distinctness the line of separation between the three branches of the government established by the constitution of the State of Delaware, and among other things said:

If we consider the peculiar situation of the United States, and go to the sources of that diversity of sentiment which pervades its inhabitants, we shall find great danger to fear that the same causes shall terminate here in the same fatal effects which they produced in those republics. To guard against these dangers and the evil tendencies of a democracy, our republican Government was instituted by the consent of the people. The characteristic which distinguishes it from the miscalled republics of ancient and modern times is that none of the powers of sovereignty are exercised by the people, but all of them by separate, coordinate branches of government in whom those powers are vested by the Constitution. These coordinate branches are intended to operate as balances, checks, and restraints, not only upon each other, but upon the people themselves; to guard them against their own rashness, precipitancy, and misguided zeal, and to protect the minority against the injustice of the majority.

The legislative, executive, and judicial powers compose the sovereign power of a state. The people of the State of Delaware have vested the legislative power in a general assembly, consisting of a senate and house of representatives; the supreme executive powers of the State in a governor; and the judicial power in the several courts mentioned in the sixth article. The sovereign power, therefore, of this State resides with the legislative, executive, and judicial departments. Having thus transferred the sovereign power, the people can not resume or exercise any portion of it. To do so would be an infraction of the constitution and a dissolution of the government. Nor can they interfere with the exercise of any part of the sovereign power, except by petition, remonstrance, or address. They have the power to change or alter the constitution; but this can be done only in the mode prescribed by the instrument itself. The attempt to do so in any other mode is revolutionary. And although the people have the power, in conformity with its provisions, to alter the constitution, under no circumstances can they, so long as the Constitution of the United States remains the paramount law of the land, establish a democracy, or any other than a republican form of government. It is equally clear that neither the legislative, executive, nor judicial department, separately, nor all combined, can devolve on the people the exercise of any part of the sovereign power with which each is vested. The assumption of a power to do so would be usurpation. The department arrogating it would elevate itself above the constitution, overturn the foundation on which its own foundation rests, demolish the whole frame and texture of our republican form of government, and prostrate everything to the worst species of tyranny and despotism, the ever-varying will of an irresponsible multitude.

IT IS CONCEDED WATSON WAS GOVERNOR OF THE STATE OF DELAWARE MAY 9, 1895, AND HAD BEEN SINCE APRIL 9, 1895, IN THE FULL SENSE OF THAT TERM.

It is not denied but conceded by counsel, in opposition to the claim of Mr. Du Pont, that William T. Watson was, on the 9th day of May, 1895, and had been since April 9, 1895, governor of the State. In their able and elaborate brief filed in the case (p. 30), in a reference to certain statements in the brief of counsel for Mr. Du Pont, we find the following:

Thus counsel devote thirty pages of their brief (pp. 34–63) to a demonstration of the fact that the speaker of the senate, in case of a vacancy in the office of governor, becomes governor of the State. The matter counsel present on this head attests their industry and may interest the curious, but it supports a proposition which we do not contest.

It is conceded, therefore, by those opposing the claim of Mr. Du Pont, that Mr. Watson, on his inauguration as governor, became the governor of the State. He was not merely to exercise the office of governor ex officio. Not merely to act as governor in the manner the President pro tempore of the United States Senate would have acted in the case of vacancies in the offices of President and Vice-President under the act of 1792. The distinction is this: If an office be appendant, as the expression is in 1 Leon, 321, to another office, the determination of the first office will determine the second. This is where a person holding any office is ex officio entitled to perform the functions of some other office, as was the case perhaps of President pro tempore of the United States Senate under the act of 1792. In such case the right to exercise the functions of the second office ceases upon the determination of the office held in virtue of which he exercises such ex officio functions of the second office.

If, however, the nomination or appointment to an office, as it is in the case under consideration by descriptio personam, of one who holds another office by the title of which he is described, and who, on a contingency, is to enter and fill another office, he answering the description at the time the contingency arises, designates him as the person who is to fill the office, and when, as thus designated, he enters into the office, he holds it in his natural and not in his official capacity. And hence in this case of Watson, even in the absence of any affirmative constitutional declaration, he would continue to hold the office of governor—if the term continued—after his term of senator had expired, his office of governor not being appendant to that of senator. But in this case the Delaware constitution, recognizing this principle, declares, in section 14, Article III, not that he shall exercise the office of governor so long as his term of senator shall continue, but "until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified." (Chadwick v. Earhart, 11 Oregon, 394.)

GOVERNOR WATSON DID NOT RESUME THE CHAIR OF SPEAKER OF THE SENATE ABOUT 12 M., MAY 9, 1895, AFTER A CONTINUED ABSENCE OF A MONTH FROM DATE OF HIS INAUGURATION AS GOVERNOR, ON APRIL 9, 1895, AS THE RESULT OF A sense of public duty OR believing he had any right to do so, BUT AS AN AFTERTHOUGHT AND AS the result of pressure from political associates and of a partisan conspiracy, AND FOR THE sole PURPOSE OF DEFEATING THE ELECTION OF A REPUBLICAN UNITED STATES SENATOR.

Senator John M. C. Moore, in his affidavit of January 14, 1896 (see appendix), states that Governor Watson said to him in the senate chamber on May 9, 1895, shortly before he resumed the speaker's chair:

"Mr. Moore, I want to talk with you. I believe you will tell me just as it is. Is Mr. Massey out of this thing?" (Mr. Massey was one of the Republican candidates being voted for for United States Senator.) Senator Moore states he said to him in reply: "Governor, we are not going to cast another ballot for Mr. Massey nor no other who has been balloted for except Henry A. Du Pont. He will be elected on first ballot in the joint session," to which the governor replied to me: 'If that be the case, I shall take my seat.' Against this I remonstrated, and said to him: 'Governor, I hope you will not do it; I think too much of you as a man for you to do it.' That was the last of our conversation. He made no reply to my remonstrance. He arose and went over to the desk of George Fisher Pierce, a senator and one of my colleagues from Sussex County, where I saw him take a seat near Senator Pierce."

Senator George Fisher Pierce in his affidavit filed herein, of date January 13, 1896 (see appendix), says:

About ten minutes before the hour of noon, May 9, 1895, William T. Watson, governor of the State of Delaware, being in the chamber (the senate being presided over by William T. Records, its speaker), came and took a seat alongside of this deponent and said to him: "I am going into the joint assembly and vote for a Senator." This deponent said: "You are going to do what?" He answered: "I am going to preside over the joint assembly to-day and vote for a United States Senator." This deponent then said: "Do you think that is right?" Governor Watson answered: "No; I do not, but my party has overruled me." This deponent answered: "Then, I suppose, there is nothing I can say now that would change your mind;" to which Watson replied, "No, my mind is fully made up."

J. S. Prettyman, jr., in his affidavit filed herein, dated January 14, 1896 (see appendix), after reciting that he met and walked with Governor Watson from the railroad station at Milford, Del., into the center of the town, a distance of about one-quarter of a mile, about 6.45 o'clock p. m., May 9, 1895, the day the Delaware legislature adjourned, says: "During this walk Governor Watson said to me that when he went to Dover on the morning of that day he did not expect to preside as speaker of the senate, believing that he did not have a legal right to act as governor and senator. After reaching Dover, in response to the influence of party leaders, he reversed this decision and consented to enter the senate and claim his rights as speaker. In doing this he said he put aside his own judgment, and acted upon the judgment of those whom he regarded as well qualified to advise." This witness further states in this affidavit that on the Friday following the above conversation he had another conversation with Governor Watson, when the latter, becoming somewhat excited, drew from his pocket a paper and handed it to witness, saying, "Read this!"

Deponent says: "I took the paper and read the writing through. It was an agreement between Robert J. Hanby, Newall Ball, Charles Moore, and John Robbins, members of the Delaware legislature, signed with their names, and to the effect that they would vote for J. Edward Addicks for United States Senator, and that they would not vote for anyone else, even though no Senator should be elected. As I passed the paper back to the governor, he said: 'Wouldn't you have acted as I did, under such circumstances?' I evaded his question by saying, 'Are the signatures genuine?' and he replied, 'Of course they are; look again;' and he passed the paper to me for the second time. I read it through again, and examined the signatures, remarking that I was not familiar with the autographs of these men, but that the names were in different handwritings. He said he was not familiar with the autographs of the men, but that he was sure the names were genuine. The governor also said that this agreement was brought to him to induce him to take part in the last joint assembly of the legislature, and, influenced by it, through the advice of others, he consented to preside as speaker of that body, and did so preside on the day mentioned.

"He further said the Republicans had every opportunity to elect a Senator, and had failed to do so, and of course he preferred that the Democratic party should have a representative in the United States Senate from Delaware, rather than the Republican party."

Frank Reedy, in his affidavit of date January 23, 1896, filed herein (see appendix), states he had a similar conversation with Governor Watson on May 10, 1895, in which he showed him the same or a similar paper.

From the foregoing uncontradicted testimony it is clearly evident Governor Watson did not reenter the speaker's chair and the joint assembly May 9, 1895, from any sense of public duty, or in the belief that he had any legal right to do so, but rather in pursuance of a partisan conspiracy and for the sole purpose of defeating the election of a Republican in the United States Senate.

IT IS CONCEDED A CERTIFICATE OF DU PONT'S ELECTION FROM THE GOVERNOR OF DELAWARE IS NOT AN ESSENTIAL REQUISITE.

Mr. Du Pont's election is not certified by William T. Watson, then holding the office of governor of the State of Delaware, but is certified to by Henry H. McMullen, speaker of the house of representatives, and attested by Edgar T. Hastings, clerk of the house of representatives. (See Senate Ex. Doc. No. 9, first session Fifty-fourth Congress.)

It is conceded, however, and, in fact, in view of the precedents, could not well be contested by those opposing the claim of Mr. Du Pont to a seat in the Senate. His title to such seat is not impaired by the fact that he fails to present a certificate of election from Mr. Watson, the then governor of the State, as evidence of his election, provided he received a majority of the legal votes cast in the joint assembly. (See argument in opposition to Mr. Du Pont's claim, p. 5.)

THE UNION OF EXECUTIVE AND LEGISLATIVE FUNCTIONS IS ABSOLUTISM OR DESPOTISM ON THE ONE HAND AND SLAVERY ON THE OTHER, WHETHER UNITED IN ONE MAN OR THE MANY.

Dr. Lieber, in his work on Civil Liberty and Self-Government, says:

A principal and guaranty of liberty, so acknowledged and common with the Anglican people that few think of its magnitude, yet of really organic and fundamental importance, is the division of government into the three distinct functions, or rather the keeping of these functions clearly apart.

It is, as has been mentioned, one of the greatest political blessings of England that from a very early period her courts of justice were not occupied with "administrative business," for instance, the collection of taxes, and that her Parliament became the exclusive legislature, while the Parliaments of France united a judicial, legislative, and administrative character. The union of these functions is absolutism or despotism on the one hand and slavery on the other, no matter in whom they are united, whether in one despot or in many, or in the multitude, as in Athens after the time of Cleon the tanner. The English political philosophers have pointed out long ago the necessity of keeping the three powers separate in a "constitutional" government. Those, however, who have no other difinition of liberty than that it is equality, discard this division, except, indeed, so far as the mere convenience of transacting business would require (pp. 154, 155).

MR. WEBSTER'S VIEWS ON MAINTAINING CONSTITUTIONAL RESTRAINTS AND JUST DIVISIONS OF POLITICAL POWER.

Counsel for Mr. Du Pont, in their brief, quote the following statement from a speech of Mr. Webster in the Senate of the United States, May 7, 1834, on the "Presidential protest," which your committee deem worthy of consideration in connection with the questions involved in this case:

The first object of a free people is the preservation of their liberty; and liberty is only to be preserved by maintaining constitutional restraints and just divisions of political power. Nothing is more deceptive or more dangerous than the pretense of a desire to simplify government. The simplest governments are despotisms; the next simplest, limited monarchies; but all republics, all governments of law, must impose numerous limitations and qualifications of authority, and give many positive and many qualified rights. In other words, they must be subject to rule and regulation. This is the very essence of free political institutions.

The spirit of liberty is, indeed, a bold and fearless spirit; but it is also a sharp-sighted spirit; it is a cautious, sagacious, discriminating, far-seeing intelligence; it is jealous of encroachment, jealous of power, jealous of man. It demands checks; it seeks for guards; it insists on securities; it entrenches itself behind strong defenses, and fortifies itself with all possible care against the assaults of ambition and passion. It does not trust the amiable weaknesses of human nature, and therefore it will not permit power to overstep its prescribed limits, though benevolence, good intent, and patriotic purpose come along with it. Neither does it satisfy itself with flashy and temporary resistance to illegal authority. Far otherwise. It seeks for duration and permanence. It looks before and after; and, building on the experience of ages that are past, it labors diligently for the benefit of ages to come. This is the nature of constitutional liberty; and this is our liberty, if we will rightly understand and preserve it. Every free government is necessarily complicated, because all governments establish restraints, as well on the power of government itself as on that of individuals. If we will abolish the distinction of branches and have but one branch; if we will abolish jury trials and leave all to the judge; if we will then ordain that the legislator himself shall be that judge, and if we will place the executive power in the same hands, we may readily simplify government. We may easily bring it to the simplest of all forms—a pure despotism. But a separation of departments, so far as practicable, and the preservation of clear lines of division between them, is the fundamental idea in the creation of all our constitutions; and doubtless the continuance of regulated liberty depends on maintaining these boundaries. (Works of Daniel Webster, Vol. IV, p. 122.)

And still further—

Mr. President, the contest for ages has been to rescue liberty from the grasp of executive power. Whoever has engaged in her sacred cause, from the days of the downfall of those great aristocracies which had stood between the king and the people to the time of our own independence, has struggled for the accomplishment of that single object. On the long list of the champions of human freedom there is not one name dimmed by the reproach of advocating the extension of executive authority; on the contrary, the uniform and steady purpose of all such champions has been to limit and restrain it. To this end the spirit of liberty, growing more and more enlightened and more and more vigorous from age to age, has been battering for centuries against the solid butments of the feudal system. To this end all that could be gained from the imprudence, snatched from the weakness, or wrung from the necessities of crowned heads has been carefully gathered up, secured, and hoarded, as the rich treasures, the very jewels of liberty.

To this end popular and representative right has kept up its warfare against prerogative with various success; sometimes writing the history of a whole age in blood, sometimes witnessing a martyrdom of Sidneys and Russells, often baffled and repulsed, but still gaining on the whole, and holding what it gained with a grasp which nothing but the complete extinction of its own being could compel it to relinquish. At length the great conquest over executive power in the leading western states of Europe has been accomplished. The feudal system, like other stupendous fabrics of past ages, is known only by the rubbish which it has left behind it. Crowned heads have been compelled to submit to the restraints of law, and the people with that intelligence and that spirit which make their voice resistless, have been able to say to prerogative: "Thus far shalt thou come, and no farther." I need hardly say, sir, that into the full enjoyment of all which Europe has reached only through such slow and painful steps we sprang at once by the Declaration of Independence and by the establishment of free representative governments; governments borrowing more or less from the models of other free states, but strengthened, secured, improved in their symmetry and deepened in their foundation by those great men of our own country whose names will be as familiar to future times as if they were written on the arch of the sky.

Through all this history of the contest for liberty executive power has been regarded as a lion which must be caged. So far from being the object of enlightened popular trust, so far from being considered the natural protector of popular right, it has been dreaded, uniformly always dreaded, as the great source of its danger.

And now, sir, who is he, so ignorant of the history of liberty, at home and abroad; who is he, yet dwelling in his contemplations among the principles and dogmas of the Middle Ages; who is he, from whose bosom all original infusion of American spirit has become so entirely evaporated and exhaled that he shall put into the mouth of the President of the United States the doctrine that the defense of liberty naturally results to executive power and is its peculiar duty? Who is he that, generous and confiding toward power where it is most dangerous, and jealous only of those who can restrain it; who is he that, reversing the order of the state and upheaving the base, would poise the pyramid of the political system upon its apex? Who is he that, overlooking with contempt the guardianship of the representatives of the people, and with equal contempt the higher guardianship of the people themselves; who is he that declares to us, through the President's lips, that the security for freedom rests in executive authority? Who is he that belies the blood and libels the fame of his own ancestors by declaring that they, with solemnity of form and force of manner, have invoked the executive power to come to the protection of liberty? Who is he that thus charges them with the insanity or the recklessness of putting the lamb beneath the lion's paw?

No, sir. No, sir. Our security is in our watchfulness of executive power. It was the constitution of this department which was infinitely the most difficult part in the great work of creating our present Government. To give to the executive department such power as should make it useful and yet not such as should render it dangerous; to make it efficient, independent, and strong, and yet to prevent it from sweeping away everything by its union of military and civil authority; by the influence of patronage, and office, and favor; this, indeed, was difficult. They who had the work to do saw the difficulty, and we see it; and if we would maintain our system we shall act wisely to that end by preserving every restraint and every guard which the Constitution has provided. And when we and those who come after us have done all that we can do and all that they can do, it will be well for us and for them if some popular executive, by the power of patronage and party, and the power, too, of that very popularity shall not hereafter prove an overmatch for all other branches of the Government. (Works of Daniel Webster, Vol. IV, pp. 133, 134, 135.)

Montesquieu, in his Spirit of Laws, volume 1, page 152, says:

When the legislative and executive powers are united in the same person, or in the same body of magistrates, there can be no liberty; because apprehensions may arise, lest the same monarch or senate should enact tyrannical laws, to execute them in a tyrannical manner.

Again, there is no liberty if the judiciary power be not separated from the legislative and executive. Were it joined with the legislative, the life and liberty of the subject would be exposed to arbitrary control, for the judge would be then the legislator. Were it joined to the executive power, the judge might behave with violence and oppression.

There would be an end of everything were the same man or the same body, whether of the nobles or of the people, to exercise those three powers—that of enacting laws, that of executing the public resolutions, and of trying the causes of individuals.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW AND FACT.

(1) It is a well-settled rule of the common law that the same person shall not exercise simultaneously two incompatible offices; and further, the acceptance of one is ipso facto a resignation of the other.

(2) Under the American system executive and legislative offices are incompatible, and the same person can not exercise both simultaneously in the absence of either express or clearly implied statutory or constitutional authority; and the acceptance of the second is ipso facto a resignation of the first.

(3) There is no express or implied authority in the constitution of the State of Delaware for the simultaneous exercise by the same person of the offices of governor and senator; on the contrary, such constitution expressly interdicts such exercise of those two offices.

(4) Whether or not the offices of State senator and speaker of the senate became absolutely vacant when Speaker Watson took the oath of office, was inaugurated governor of the State, and entered upon the exercise of that office, there can be no doubt, on a fair construction of the several constitutional provisions of the State of Delaware, that his right to exercise the office of Senator or speaker of the senate, or any of the functions connected therewith while he continued to hold and exercise the office of governor, was held in abeyance and absolutely suspended.

(5) The theory that Mr. Watson can exercise the office of governor of the State and State senator simultaneously, involves innumerable constitutional repugnancies, perplexing difficulties, and endless absurdities; while the opposite theory reconciles and harmonizes all the provisions of the Delaware constitution relating to the subject under consideration.

(6) That Governor Watson's exercise of the office of senator in the joint assembly on the 9th day of May, 1895, and of the office of president of such joint assembly was illegal, and his vote therein for United States Senator a nullity.

In determining the above propositions, your committee reach the further following conclusions:

(7) In determining the question as to whether the Delaware senate on May 9, 1895, acted upon or judged, either actually or constructively, the qualifications of Governor Watson to a seat in the senate, the journal entries of the proceedings of the Delaware senate of that date are conclusive as to the number and names of senators present, the motions submitted, the votes cast, and of all the proceedings had, and can not be contradicted by ex parte affidavits.

(8) The right which undoubtedly belongs exclusively to the Delaware senate to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of members does not vest in such senate any such exclusive right as would conclude the Senate of the United States to determine by construction whether the constitution of the State of Delaware does or does not recognize a certain seat in the senate as subject to occupation; nor does it include the power to admit members to seats not recognized by the constitution of the State as subject to occupation, or if subject to occupation, to fill them in a manner or by a person which the State constitution forbids.

(9) Your committee, applying these rules, find as a matter of fact the Delaware State senate never judged of the qualifications of Governor Watson to a seat in the senate, either on the 9th day of May, 1895, or at any other time subsequent to the date of his inauguration as governor.

(10) That on May 9, 1895, the date on which Mr. Du Pont claims to have been elected, the legislature of the State of Delaware consisted of but 29 members; there were in the joint assembly on that date but 29 members of such legislature entitled to seats in such joint assembly and entitled to be counted and vote therein. As Mr. Du Pont received 15 votes, being a majority of the whole number entitled to be cast in such joint assembly, and a majority of all the legal votes cast therein, he was legally elected Senator from the State of Delaware for the full term commencing March 4, 1895, and is entitled to be seated.

(11) The fact that such election is not certified by the governor of the State in pursuance of the statute on that subject does not invalidate such election in any respect.

Your committee therefore report to the Senate the following resolution and recommend its adoption:

Resolved, That Henry A. Du Pont is entitled to a seat in the Senate from the State of Delaware for the full term commencing March 4, 1895.

AFFIDAVIT OF JOHN M. C. MOORE.

In the matter of the claim of Henry A. Du Pont to a seat in the Senate of the United States as Senator from the State of Delaware for the term beginning on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1895, and ending on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1901.

STATE OF DELAWARE, Newcastle County, ss:

Be it remembered that on this 14th day of January, A. D. 1896, before me, Edwin R. Cochran, jr., a notary public for the State of Delaware for the county aforesaid, personally comes John

M. C. Moore, who, being by me first duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

That he resides in the town of Bethel, Broad Creek Hundred, Sussex County, and State of Delaware; that he was elected senator of said State from Sussex County at the last general election, held on the 6th day of November, A. D. 1894, and took his seat as a member of the senate of the State of Delaware on the 1st day of January, A. D. 1895; that he was present in the senate chamber at Dover, Del., on Thursday, the 9th day of May, A. D. 1895, at 11 o'clock a. m., that being the time and place at which the final legislative session of the said senate for the session of 1895 was held; that he was present when the said legislative session was called to order, and remained in the senate chamber until the senate proceeded to the hall of the house of representatives to take part in the proceedings of the joint assembly for the election of a United States Senator; that when the senate convened in the said final legislative session, at 11 o'clock a. m., on the said 9th day of May, A. D. 1895, William T. Records, speaker pro tempore, occupied the speaker's chair and presided over the session, received and put motions, and voted on bills; that the said William T. Records, speaker pro tempore, continued to occupy the speaker's chair until near the hour of 12 o'clock noon, and until the senate was just about to proceed to the hall of the house of representatives to take part in the joint assembly for the purpose of electing a United States Senator; that while the said William T. Records, speaker pro tempore, occupied the speaker's chair as aforesaid, being from the beginning of the session at 11 o'clock until within a few minutes before 12 o'clock noon, Governor William T. Watson did not receive and put motions, and did not vote on bills then pending before the senate, and did not in any manner participate in the legislative functions of a senator; that on the day of the said last session of the senate of Delaware, while William T. Records, speaker pro tempore, occupied the speaker's chair, near the hour of noon on that day, being, so far as I can remember, about 15 minutes of 12 o'clock, Governor William T. Watson came into the senate chamber and occupied a chair beside me at my desk.

The conversation which occurred between us was as follows: Governor Watson said to me, "Mr. Moore, I want to talk with you. I believe you will tell me just as it is. Is Mr. Massey out of this thing?" I said to him in reply, "Governor, he is. We are not going to cast another ballot for Mr. Massey nor no other man who has been balloted for except Henry A. Du Pont. He will be elected on the first ballot in the joint session." To which Governor Watson replied to me, "If that be the case, I shall take my seat." Against this I remonstrated, and said to him, "Governor, I hope you will not do it. I think too much of you as a man for you to do it." That was the last of our conversation. He made no reply to my remonstrance. He arose and went over to the desk of George Fisher Pierce, a senator and one of my colleagues from Sussex County, where I saw him take a seat near Senator Pierce. That deponent remembers that William T. Records, speaker pro tempore, just about the hour of 12 o'clock noon on the said 9th day of May, A. D. 1895, left the speaker's chair, whereupon Governor William T. Watson proceeded to occupy the said speaker's chair; and this deponent remembers that after the said Governor William T. Watson took his seat as aforesaid he took part in no legislative functions of the senate other than what related to proceeding to the hall of the house of representatives, by the senate, for the purpose of attending the joint assembly to elect a United States Senator; that Governor Watson announced, "The hour of 12 having arrived, the senate will proceed to take part in the joint assembly;" that the said deponent attended the session of the legislature of Delaware from the day on which it was convened, to wit, on the 1st day of January, A. D. 1895, until the day of its adjournment without day on the 1st day of May, A. D. 1895, excepting a period covering about a week occurring during the lifetime of Governor Marvil, and excepting about one day during the period following the taking the oath of office as governor by William T. Watson; that after the said William T. Watson took the oath of office as governor at the time of the death of the then Governor Joshua Marvil he never took part in the legislative functions of the senate; that he never joined the senators in the discharge of their duties except on the last day of the session, as hereinbefore set forth; that during the session of the legislature of Delaware, convened at Dover on the 1st day of January, A. D. 1895, and lasting until the 9th day of May, A. D. 1895, it was well known to Governor William T. Watson that this deponent had, with others, throughout the said session of the legislature, voted for George V. Massey for United States Senator, and your deponent was led to believe by the acts and words of Governor William T. Watson, and does believe, that he, Governor Watson, would not have undertaken to participate in the election of a United States Senator on the last day of the session as above set forth if he had not assured himself that this deponent would not continue voting for the said George V. Massey, and that the said deponent was led to believe by the acts and words of Governor William T. Watson, and does believe that he, the said Governor Watson, undertook to participate in the election of a United States Senator on the said last day of the session of 1895, to wit, on the 9th day of May, 1895, in order to prevent the election of Henry A. Du Pont as United States Senator from the State of Delaware.

AFFIDAVIT OF GEORGE F. PIERCE.

In the matter of the claim of Henry A. Du Pont to a seat in the Senate of the United States as Senator from the State of Delaware for the term beginning on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1895, and ending on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1901.

STATE OF DELAWARE, Newcastle County, ss:

On this 13th day of January, A. D. 1896, before me, Edward G. Cook, a notary public for the State of Delaware for the county aforesaid, personally comes George Fisher Pierce, who, being by me first duly sworn according to law, doth depose and say that he resides at Milford, Sussex County and State of Delaware; that he is a member of the senate of said State, having been elected at the general election held on November 6, 1894, and took his seat in said senate on the 1st day of January, 1895; that he was present in the senate at its final session, which convened at 11 a. m. on Thursday, May 9, 1895, and after a session of one hour ended at noon on said day, when the senate, without motion, proceeded to the hall of the house of representatives and took part in the joint assembly then convened for the election of a United States Senator; that during said hour—from 11 until 12 o'clock—the senate was presided over by William T. Records, its speaker; that about ten minutes before the hour of noon William T. Watson, governor of the State of Delaware, being in the chamber, came and took a seat alongside of this deponent, and said to him: "I am going into the joint assembly and vote for a Senator." This deponent said: "You are going to do what?" He answered: "I am going to preside over the joint assembly to-day and vote for a United States Senator." This deponent then said: "Do you think that is right?" Governor Watson answered: "No, I do not; but my party has overruled me." This deponent answered, "Then I suppose there is nothing I can say now that would change your mind," to which Watson replied: "No; my mind is fully made up."

Throughout the hour William T. Records presided as speaker, put all motions, and performed all the duties belonging to the office. Just as the hour of 12 arrived, and the senate were about to proceed to the hall of the house of representatives to take part in the joint assembly, William T. Records left the speaker's chair, William T. Watson took it, and all he did, to the best of this deponent's recollection, as speaker, was to announce that, "The hour of 12 having arrived, the senate will proceed to take part in the joint assembly."

On the day following, between the hours of 11 and 12, in the town of Milford, where we both reside, I met Governor Watson at the Central Hotel. Several persons were present; among them I recollect Napoleon Gray, though I can not remember who the others were. They were sitting in a room generally used by commercial travelers for exposing their samples. While the party was sitting there, William T. Watson took a paper out of his pocket, and without saying anything handed it to me. I read it and handed it back to him without saying anything. The paper, as I recollect it to the best of my knowledge and belief, read about as follows: "We, the undersigned, pledge ourselves to vote for John Edward Addicks first, last, and all the time." I think there was a line or two more, but I can not recollect what it was. This paper was signed by Newell Ball, Charles Moore, John Robbins, and Robert J. Hanby. The first three were members of the house of representatives, and Mr. Hanby was a member of the senate.

That he resides at Glasgow, in Pencader Hundred, Newcastle County and State of Delaware; that he was elected senator of said State at the last general election, held on the 6th day of November, A. D. 1894, and took his seat as a member of the senate on the 1st day of January, A. D. 1895; that this deponent was present throughout the entire session; that he presented, as chairman of the committee on judiciary, a number of bills during that session, and that he voted on all bills and motions that were before the senate; that William T. Records was the speaker in the chair when the motions were put by this deponent on the bills aforesaid; that William T. Watson entered the chamber shortly before the hour of noon, but did not take the chair until just after the legislative business was ended, and just as the senate was about to proceed to the hall of the house of representatives to take part in the joint assembly for the election of a United States Senator; that this deponent has no recollection that the said William T. Watson presided, or undertook to preside, over the senate during said session that morning, or that he put any motions, voted on any bills or other motions whatever as senator or speaker until just as the senate was about to proceed to the hall of the house of representatives to take part in the joint assembly, when he took the chair, and made the announcement that the hour had come for that purpose, and proceeded at the head of the senate to the hall of the house of representatives.

AFFIDAVIT OF EDGAR T. HASTINGS.

In the matter of the claim of Henry A. Du Pont to a seat in the Senate of the United States as Senator from the State of Delaware for the term beginning on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1895, and ending on the 4th day of March, 1901.

STATE OF DELAWARE, Newcastle County, ss:

Be it remembered that on this 14th day of January, A. D. 1896, before me, Edward G. Cook, a notary public of the State of Delaware, for the county aforesaid, personally appeared Edgar T. Hastings, who, being by me first duly sworn according to law, doth depose and say: I reside at Millsboro, in Sussex County, in the State of Delaware. I am 47 years of age and upward. I am the clerk of the house of representatives of the State of Delaware, having been elected thereto at its organization on the 1st day of January, A. D. 1895. As clerk of the house, I recorded the proceedings of the legislative sessions of that body, and also of the joint assembly of the two houses of the legislature of the State of Delaware as convened for the election of a United States Senator from the State of Delaware. Both the house of representatives and the senate held their last legislative session between the hours of 11 a. m. and 12 noon on Thursday, the 9th day of May, A. D. 1895.

From the time of the death of Governor Marvil, William T. Watson, theretofore speaker of the senate, took no part in its meetings, and did not preside in said body at any time that I was therein, nor did he take any part in the legislative proceedings until the reassembling of the joint assembly for the election of a United States Senator at noon on the 9th day of May aforesaid, when he appeared and presided, and voted in said joint assembly until he declared it adjourned sine die at 3 p. m. During the hour between 11 a. m. and 12 o'clock noon on the 9th day of May, I had occasion frequently to present to the senate various legislative messages from the house, as appears by the record of the senate for that hour and day. At no time during that hour when I was present did Gov. William T. Watson occupy the chair as speaker or take any part in the business of the Senate.

There were a great many bills pending at the time of the adjournment sine die of the legislature on that day, and a great deal of legislative business was left unfinished. The adjournment sine die took place by reason of a joint resolution of the two houses, passed a week or two previously. This left a great pressure upon each house on the part of those interested in legislation to get their bills passed before the meeting of the joint assembly at noon on that day, and each house was kept busy by legislative proceedings until the very moment of the meeting of the joint assembly. At no time during which I was present in the senate, conveying messages from the house of representatives as its clerk, from the beginning of the session of the senate at 11 o'clock on that day until the last day I was there previous to the joint assembly meeting, did I see Governor Watson in the chair or otherwise acting as speaker of the senate.

EDGAR T. HASTINGS.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 14th day of January, A. D. 1896.

In witness whereof I have hereunto affixed my hand and official seal.

AFFIDAVIT OF JOHN S. PRETTYMAN, JR.

STATE OF DELAWARE, County of Sussex, ss:

Be it remembered that on this 14th day of January, A. D. 1896, before me, Philip S. Graham, a notary public of the State of Delaware, for the county aforesaid, personally comes John S. Prettyman, jr., who, being first duly sworn by me according to law, deposes and says:

I am 35 years of age and upward, and reside in the town of Milford, Sussex County, and State of Delaware.

On Thursday, the 9th day of May, A. D. 1895, upon the arrival of the 6.45 p. m. train, I walked from the railroad station at Milford, Del., into the center of the town, about one-quarter of a mile in distance, with William T. Watson, governor of Delaware. This was the day the Delaware legislature adjourned after the contest for the election of a United States Senator, in which the governor presided in the joint assembly as speaker. During this walk Governor Watson said to me that when he went to Dover on the morning of that day he did not expect to preside as speaker of the senate, believing that he did not have a legal right to act as governor and senator. After reaching Dover, in response to the influence of party leaders, he reversed this decision, and consented to enter the senate and claim his rights as speaker. In doing this, he said, he put aside his own judgment, and acted upon the judgment of those whom he regarded as well qualified to advise. He also said that if anyone would convince him that he had acted illegally in the matter he would sign Mr. Du Pont's certificate of election.

On Friday, following this conversation, I met Governor Watson about 11.30 a. m. in T. F. Hammersley's drug store, in Milford. I said to him that the fact of the Speaker of the United States Senate abandoning his functions as Senator upon becoming President of the United States might have some weight with the Senate in considering the seating of Mr. Du Pont. He seemed indignant, and blurted out in an angry manner: "What's that got to do with it? If you would read a little you might know something." I replied quietly that his remark was a very foolish one; that I did not know that he had ever been credited with superior wisdom or learning, and that neither of our opinions was worth very much in the matter. He then quickly and excitedly drew from his pocket a folded piece of writing paper and said: "Read this." I took the paper and read the writing through. It was an agreement between Robert J. Hanby, Newall Ball, Charles Moore, and John Robbins, members of the Delaware legislature, signed with their names and to the effect that they would vote for J. Edward Addicks for United States Senator and that they would not vote for anyone else, even though no Senator should be elected. As I passed the paper back to the governor he said: "Wouldn't you have acted as I did under such circumstances?" I evaded his question by saying, "Are the signatures genuine?" and he replied, "Of course they are; look again;" and he passed the paper to me for the second time.

I read it through again and examined the signatures, remarking that I was not familiar with the autographs of these men, but that the names were in different handwritings. He said that he was not familiar with the autographs of the men, but that he was sure the names were genuine. The governor also said that this agreement was brought to him to induce him to take part in the last joint assembly of the legislature, and, influenced by it, through the advice of others, he consented to preside as speaker of that body, and did so preside upon the day mentioned. He further said that the Republicans had every opportunity to elect a Senator and had failed to do so, and of course he preferred that the Democratic party should have a representative in the United States Senate from Delaware rather than the Republican party.

In the matter of the claim of Henry A. Du Pont to a seat in the Senate of the United States as Senator from the State of Delaware for the term beginning on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1895, and ending on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1901.

STATE OF DELAWARE, Newcastle County, ss:

Be it remembered that on this 13th day of January, A. D. 1896, before me, Edward G. Cook, a notary public of the State of Delaware for the county aforesaid, personally comes Frank Reedy, who, being first duly sworn by me according to law, deposes and says:

I am 47 years of age and upward, and reside in the town of Milford, in Kent County and State of Delaware.

On Friday, the 10th day of May, A. D. 1895, about 10 o'clock a. m., I met William T. Watson, governor of the State of Delaware, in the town of Milford, where we both reside, that being the day after the adjournment of the general assembly and the ending of the contest for the election of a United States Senator. Governor Watson said to me, "You fellows ought not to be so hard on me for not electing a United States Senator; you ought to blame those other four men." I replied, "We do not blame you altogether, but we think you ought not to have gone in there at the time you did if you had not gone before." Watson then said, "I did not go in until I had the best legal talent of the party advising me so to do, and not until I had got this;" and he handed me a paper. This paper, as well as I can remember, read about as follows: "We, the undersigned, hereby pledge ourselves to vote for John Edward Addicks first, last, and all the time." There may have been a couple more lines, but I can not remember where or what they were.

This paper was signed by Charles Moore, Newall Ball, John Robbins, and Robert J. Hanby. The first three were members of the house of representatives of the State, and the said Hanby was a member of the senate.

Squire Robert J. Beswick came up about that time and I handed the paper back to Governor Watson without anything further being said by either of us.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, District of Delaware, ss:

On this 13th day of January, A. D. 1896, before me, S. Rodmond Smith, United States commissioner, duly appointed by the circuit court of the United States for the district of Delaware, personally appeared George L. Townsend, who being by me first duly sworn according to law, doth depose and say:

That he resides at Odessa, in the county of Newcastle and State of Delaware; that shortly after 12 o'clock noon on the 9th day of May, A. D. 1895, he entered the hall of the house of representatives of the State of Delaware, in the State capitol at Dover, while the joint assembly of the two houses of the general assembly was convened in said room in the election of a United States Senator from the State of Delaware, and remained in said room most of the time until the final adjournment of that body at 3 o'clock p. m. on that day.

That the chair was occupied by William T. Watson, the governor of the State, as speaker, while this deponent was present as aforesaid, and that, while the said William T. Watson was thus presiding as the speaker of the senate, this deponent saw William T. STATE OF DELAWARE, Newcastle County, ss:

Be it remembered, that on this 23d day of January, A. D. 1896, before me, John A. Kelley, a notary public for the State of Delaware for the county aforesaid, personally comes William Michael Byrne, who, being by me first duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

I am 30 years of age and reside in the city of Wilmington, Newcastle County, and State of Delaware. On Tuesday, the 21st day of January instant, I visited the office of the secretary of state of the State of Delaware, in the city of Dover, Kent County and State of Delaware, and by permission of the secretary of state examined all acts, bills, and resolutions mentioned in the senate journal for the session of the senate of Delaware held on May 9, 1895, between the hours of 11 o'clock a. m. and 12 o'clock m., excepting joint resolution in relation to paying William T. Smithers, joint resolution in relation to paying John D. Hawkins, secretary of state, and an act to divorce Benjamin O. Jacobs from his wife, Victoria W. Jacobs, all three of which, upon search, I was unable to find, the act above named having failed of passage and not appearing in the published pamphlet of the laws of Delaware for 1895.

Affidavits of Robert J. Hanby, William T. Records, Charles A. Hastings, John B. Penington, and Edward D. Hearne, members of the legislature of the State of Delaware, relative to the case of Henry A. Du Pont, claiming to have been elected a United States Senator from that State.

AFFIDAVIT OF ROBERT J. HANBY.

STATE OF DELAWARE, Newcastle County, ss:

On this 9th day of January, A. D. 1896, personally comes before me, Howell S. England, a notary public for the State of Delaware, Robert J. Hanby, who, being by me first duly sworn according to law, deposes and says as follows:

At the general election held in the State of Delaware on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, A. D. 1894, I was duly elected to the office of senator in the general assembly of said State from Newcastle County, for the term of four years. Upon the organization of the general assembly, in January, 1895, I duly qualified and took my seat in the senate of said State, and have continued as senator ever since. I took part in the proceedings of the senate from day to day, and I was present and participated in the proceedings of the final joint meeting of the senate and house of representatives on the 9th day of May, A. D. 1895. Agreeably to and in pursuance of a law passed by Congress for such cases made and provided, the senate and house of representatives, comprising the general assembly of the State of Delaware, met in joint meeting on the morning of May 9, 1895, and took a number of ballots for the purpose of trying to elect a United States Senator from the State of Delaware for the term beginning March 4, 1895.

After taking six ballots for such Senator, without electing anyone, the joint meeting separated to meet again at 12 o'clock noon of the same day. The members of the senate returned to their chamber and there resumed the exercise of their ordinary legislative functions. Some time between the hours of 11 o'clock a. m. of that day and 12 o'clock noon, and while the senate was in session in its own chamber attending to the regular legislative functions imposed upon it by the constitution of the State of Delaware, William T. Watson, speaker of the senate, and at that time exercising the office of governor, entered the senate chamber and resumed the speaker's chair, which was thereupon vacated by William T. Records, who had been elected speaker pro tempore of the senate during the absence of William T. Watson, speaker. No word of protest was heard from any senator, questioning the right of William T. Watson to resume the speaker's chair and to exercise his functions as a senator.

William T. Watson continued to preside as speaker of the senate until 12 o'clock noon of May 9, 1895, when he declared that the time had arrived for the reconvening of the joint meeting of the two houses of the general assembly, in compliance with a motion to that effect adopted at the morning session of the joint meeting on the same day. William T. Watson, speaker of the senate, accompanied by all the other senators, then proceeded to the chamber of the house of representatives, where the joint meeting reconvened.

AFFIDAVIT OF CYRUS CORT, CHAPLAIN OF THE SENATE OF THE STATE OF DELAWARE

On this 25th day of January, A. D. 1896, personally came before me, Henry R. Draper, a notary public for the State of Delaware, Cyrus Cort, who, being by me first duly sworn according to law, deposes and says as follows:

I am a resident of the State of Delaware, living at Wyoming, in said State. I was elected chaplain of the senate of the State of Delaware for the session of 1895, and in such capacity I performed my functions whenever the senate was in session. I was present and witnessed the proceedings of the senate and the joint meeting of the two houses of the general assembly on May 9, 1895, and I was an eyewitness to the proceedings of those two bodies on that day. On the morning of May 9, 1895, while the senate was in session in its own chamber attending to its ordinary legislative functions, between the hours of 11 o'clock in the morning and 12 o'clock noon, William T. Watson entered the senate chamber and resumed the speaker's chair, which was vacated by William T. Records, speaker pro tempore. The said William T. Watson did preside in the senate, voted on motions, and otherwise took part in the proceedings of the senate, without objection from any senator questioning his right to preside and to perform his functions as a member of that body.

When the hour of 12 o'clock noon arrived, the said William T. Watson, as speaker of the senate, announced to the members of the senate that the hour had arrived for the reassembling of the joint meeting to ballot for a United States Senator, and at the head of the other senators, with gavel in hand, the said William T. Watson went to the chamber of the house of representatives and presided over the joint assembly during the numerous ballots taken for the purpose of trying to elect a United States Senator. At the conclusion of each of said ballots the members of said joint assembly acquiesced without protest in the announcement of the said William T. Watson that "No person having received a majority of the votes cast for a United States Senator, there has been no election. The clerk will proceed to call the roll for another ballot," or words to that effect. Senator Alrichs presented his protest after all the ballots had been taken. His protest was declared out of order, and the few moments remaining before the joint meeting was adjourned were consumed in motions and roll calls to adjourn or other dilatory motions.

I opened the senate with prayer on the morning of May 9, 1895; was present in the senate chamber while William T. Watson presided, voted, and performed his other legislative functions; joined the members of the senate when they proceeded to the chamber of the house of representatives, and sat with Dr. W. L. S. Murray, chaplain of the house, alongside the speaker's stand, throughout the time required to take the fruitless ballots on the afternoon of said May 9, 1895.

CYRUS CORT.

D. eighteen hundred and ninety-four, or continued in the office of senator by virtue of their election to said office at the general election held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November, A. D. eighteen hundred and ninety-two, and who took their seats in said senate at the time of the organization thereof on the first Tuesday of January, A. That Joshua H. Marvil was elected governor of the State of Delaware on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, A. D. eighteen hundred and ninety-five, had been duly elected and qualified as the speaker of the senate, duly took the oath of office as governor of said State, and thereupon entered upon the exercise of the office of governor of the State of Delaware; that the said William T. Watson, during the said session of the general assembly, and until he assumed the office of governor as aforesaid, was and remained the speaker of the senate, and as such presided over that body and voted therein, and participated and voted in the sessions aforesaid of the joint assembly of the two houses, convened for the purpose of electing a Senator from the State of Delaware in the United States Senate; that upon his qualifying and entering upon the exercise of the office of governor as aforesaid the said William T. Watson ceased to have the right to act as a member of the senate of said State, or to vote in the said joint assembly for the election of a Senator in Congress as aforesaid; that one of the ten votes so as aforesaid received in said joint assembly on the ninth day of May, A. D. eighteen hundred and ninety-five, by Edward Ridgely, was then and there given by the said William T. Watson, at that time the governor of the said State; that said vote so given for Edward Ridgely was given by the said William T. Watson illegally and in violation of the constitution of the State of Delaware, and that Henry A. Du Pont, on said ballot having received fifteen votes, and Edward Ridgely having received only nine legal votes, John E. Addicks having received four votes, and Ebe W. Tunnell having received one vote (no person having theretofore been elected to the office of Senator in Congress from the State of Delaware for said term), the said Henry A. D. eighteen hundred and ninety-five, except during occasional absence or during the recess or adjournments of the respective houses; that Joshua H. Marvil was elected governor of the State of Delaware on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, A. D. eighteen hundred and ninety-four, thereafter on the third Tuesday of January, A. D. eighteen hundred and ninety-five, duly qualified as governor of said State and entered upon the exercise of said office of governor; that thereafter, on the eighth day of April, A. D. eighteen hundred and ninety-five, the said Joshua H. Marvil, while continuing to exercise the office of governor, died, and on the following day, immediately after the taking of a ballot for United States Senator in the joint session of the general assembly, and the separation of the two houses, the said William T. Watson, having had administered to him the oath of office by Hon. James L. Wolcott, chancellor of the State of Delaware, entered upon the exercise of the office of governor of the State of Delaware; that the said William T. Watson during the said session of the general assembly and until he assumed the office of governor was the speaker of the senate, and as such presided over that body and voted therein; that the said William T. Watson, until he assumed the office of governor, as aforesaid, participated and voted in the joint sessions convened for the purpose of electing a Senator from the State of Delaware in the United States Senate; that after the said William T. Watson assumed the office of governor, as aforesaid, and until the last joint session convened for the purpose of electing a Senator as aforesaid, held at noon on the ninth day of May, A. D. eighteen hundred and ninety-five, the said William T. Watson never participated or voted in any of the joint sessions convened for the purpose of electing a Senator as aforesaid, and as deponent is informed and believes, never during that period presided over or voted in or took part in the proceedings of the senate; that at the final joint session convened for the purpose of electing a Senator as aforesaid the said William T. Watson assumed the right to preside over and vote in said joint session; that in each ballot during said last joint session, commencing at noon on the said ninth day of May, A. D. eighteen hundred and ninety-five, Henry A. Du Pont, of Christiana Hundred, Newcastle County, and State of Delaware, received fifteen votes, and that the said William T. Watson, assuming to act as a member of the said general assembly, did, at each and every of said ballots so had during the said last joint session, vote for Edward Ridgely for Senator from Delaware in the Senate of the United States; that aside from the vote of the said William T. Watson, Henry A. Du Pont at each and every ballot had during said last joint session received fifteen votes, being a majority of all the votes cast exclusive of the vote so cast by William T. Watson as aforesaid; that upon the same day on which the said William T. Watson took the oath of office and entered upon the exercise of the office of governor, and immediately thereafter William T. Records, senator from Sussex County, as aforesaid, was elected speaker pro tempore of the senate, and as such continued to precide over the deliberations of that body until the final adjournment of the general assembly on the ninth day of May, A. D. 1895; that after each and every ballot had during the last joint session, although the said William T. Records, speaker pro tempore, was present and voting, the announcement in each case that there had been no election was made, not by the said William T. Records, speaker pro tempore, but by the said William T. Watson, assuming to preside over the vote in said joint session; that the said fifteen votes cast as aforesaid for Henry A. Du Pont at the said last joint session of the legislature was the highest number of votes cast for any one person for Senator during the entire biennial session of the legislature; no person having prior to the day of the last joint session at any time during the joint sessions of the said legislature received so high a number of votes for Senator from the State of Delaware in the Senate of the United States.

In the matter of the claim of Henry A. Du Pont to a seat in the Senate of the United States as Senator from the State of Delaware for the term beginning on the fourth day of March, A. D. eighteen hundred and ninety-five, and ending on the fourth day of March, A. D. nineteen hundred and one.

STATE OF DELAWARE, Newcastle County, ss:

On this thirteenth day of July, A. D. eighteen hundred and ninety-five, personally comes before me, Howell S. England, a notary public for the State of Delaware, Henry H. McMullen, who, being by me first duly sworn according to law, doth depose and say as follows:

That deponent is a citizen of the State of Delaware, residing in New Castle Hundred, in Newcastle County, in said State, and that he was upon the organization of the general assembly of the State of Delaware, on the first Tuesday of January, A. D. 1895, duly elected speaker of the house of representatives of said State, which office deponent forthwith accepted and has ever since held and now holds; that on the 9th day of April, A. D. 1895, after the death of Joshua H. Marvil, and immediately after the taking of a ballot for United States Senator in the joint session of the general assembly of the State of Delaware, and the separation of the two houses, William T. Watson, who, upon the organization of the general assembly on the first Tuesday in January, in the year last aforesaid, had been elected speaker of the senate, had administered to him by Hon. James L. Wolcott, chancellor of the State of Delaware, the oath of office as governor of the State of Delaware, and thereupon entered upon the exercise of the office of governor as aforesaid; that the said William T. Watson assumed the office as governor as aforesaid, and until the last joint session convened for the purpose of electing a Senator as aforesaid, held at noon on the 9th day of May, A. D. 1895, the said William T. Watson never participated or voted in any of the joint sessions convened for the purpose of electing a Senator as aforesaid, and, as deponent is informed and believes, never during that time presided over or voted in or took part in the proceedings of the senate; that at the final joint session convened for the purpose of electing a Senator as aforesaid the said William T. Watson assumed the right to preside over and vote in the said joint session; that in each ballot during said last joint session, commencing at noon on the said ninth day of May, A. D. 1895, Henry A. Du Pont, of Christiana Hundred, Newcastle County and State of Delaware, received fifteen votes, and that the said William T. Watson, assuming to act as a member of the general assembly, did at each and every of said ballots so had during the said last joint session vote for Edward Ridgely for Senator from Delaware in the Senate of the United States; that aside from the vote of the said William T. 5.—AFFIDAVIT OF SAMUEL ALRICHS.

In the matter of the claim of Henry A. Du Pont to a seat in the Senate of the United States as a Senator from the State of Delaware for the term beginning on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1895, and ending on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1901.

On this twenty-fifth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-five, personally comes before me, John H. Frazer, a notary public for the State of Delaware, Samuel Alrichs, who, being first by me duly sworn according to law, doth depose and say as follows: At the general election held in the State of Delaware on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, A. D. 1894, I was duly elected to the office of senator in the general assembly of said State from Newcastle County, for the term of four years. Upon the organization of the general assembly on the first Tuesday of January, A. D. 1895, I duly qualified and took my seat in the senate of said State, and ever since have continued senator as aforesaid. I took part in the proceedings of the joint assembly of the senate and house of representatives of said State held for the purpose of electing a Senator in Congress from said State for the term of six years beginning on the fourth of March, A. D. 1895. I was present and participated in the proceedings of the final joint assembly of said two houses on the ninth day of May, A. D. 1895, and in each ballot taken during said final joint assembly voted for Henry A. Du Pont for Senator in Congress from said State. The said Henry A. Du Pont, on each ballot taken during said final assembly, received fifteen votes including my own. William T. Watson, who upon the organization of the Senate on the first Tuesday in January, A. D. 1895, was elected speaker of the senate, and who upon the death of Joshua H. Marvil, governor of the State of Delaware, in April of that year, succeeded to the office of governor of said State, wrongfully and without authority, as I believe, participated in the proceedings of said final joint assembly and voted for Edward Ridgely for Senator in Congress for said term of six years. Including the vote of William T. Watson the result of each and every ballot taken during said last joint assembly was as follows: Henry A. Du Pont received fifteen votes, Edward Ridgely received ten votes, John E. Addicks received four votes, and Ebe W. Tunnell received one vote, the said William T. Watson in each and every ballot taken during said final joint assembly voting for the said Edward Ridgely. Prior to said final joint assembly no person had been elected Senator in Congress from said State for said term of six years. After the last ballot had been taken in said final joint assembly and before the two houses separated, I, on behalf of myself and the fourteen other senators voting for the said Henry A. Du Pont, arose and presented the following challenge, protest, and demand:

"I very respectfully challenge the correctness of the announcement of this vote and divers preceding votes, and do now most respectfully insist and demand that Henry A. Du Pont be now declared elected Senator for the unexpired term of six years commencing on the fourth day of March, A. D. 1895, inasmuch as it is now respectfully insisted that this joint assembly consists of twenty-nine members, the honorable gentleman now undertaking to preside and participate therein being governor of the State, and not now a senator."

After the presentation of the foregoing challenge, protest, and demand, and without taking any further ballot, the joint assembly finally separated, with a declaration from William T. Watson that no person had been elected Senator in Congress for said term.

SAMUEL ALRICHS.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

Mr. TURPIE, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted the following views of the minority in the case of Henry A. Du Pont:

The legislature of the State of Delaware is composed of 30 members—9 senators and 21 representatives. The senators are elected for four years, the representatives for two years.

A regular biennial session of the general assembly of said State began, in pursuance of law, on the first Tuesday in January, 1895, upon which devolved the election of the United States Senator to fill a vacancy made by the expiry of the term of Hon. Anthony Higgins, upon which day aforesaid all the members of each house appeared, and both houses were duly organized for the transaction of business.

Among the members of the senate so appearing was the Hon. William T. Watson, who had been duly elected at the general election held in November, 1892, a senator from the county of Kent, in said State, for the term of four years, who was duly sworn and admitted to a seat in the senate on the last day aforesaid, and was subsequently, on the same day, chosen speaker of the senate.

Afterwards, upon April 9, 1895, the legislature having been officially informed of the death of the Hon. Joshua H. Marvil, governor of Delaware, the speaker of the senate, upon whom devolved, under the constitution, the duty to "excercise the office of governor" until a governor should be elected by the people, was in open senate, and in the public session thereof, sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, of the State of Delaware, and to perform "the duties of the office of governor with fidelity."

On the same day, immediately thereafter, the senate elected the Hon. William T. Records, a senator from the county of Sussex, as speaker of the senate pro tempore, in accordance with the provision of the constitution of the State, "Each house whose speaker shall exercise the office of governor may chose a speaker pro tempore." The speaker pro tempore thus chosen presided while and whenever the speaker of the senate was absent during the remainder of the session.

The members of the two houses so organized met in joint convention on the second Tuesday after their organization, pursuant to the law of Congress July 25, 1866, to elect a Senator of the United States. Two ballots were taken on that day, and at the close of each the announcement was made by the speaker of the senate, who acted as president of the joint convention, and who continued so to act whenever he was present at the session of the same, "that no person having received a majority of all the votes cast for United States Senator, there was no election."

On each succeeding day of the session, except Sundays, the members of the two houses met in joint convention, voted for United States Senator, up to and including the 9th day of May, 1895, which was the last day of the session.

On this last day of the session 28 ballots were taken for United States Senator, and at the close of each ballot the same result of no election, for the same reason, was declared in the same words as those above quoted.

The last ballot cast for United States Senator, on the last day of the session aforesaid, is recorded as follows:

	Votes.
For J. Edward Addicks	4
For E. W. Tunnell	1
For H. A. Du Pont	15
For Ed. Ridgley	10

It shows that there were 30 votes cast, and of these votes Mr. Du Pont received 15; an equal number of votes were cast for other persons—for Mr. Addicks 4, for Mr. Tunnell 1, and for Mr. Ridgley 10.

Thereupon the speaker of the senate declared, no person having received a majority of all the votes cast for United States Senator, there was no election, and the two houses adjourned sine die.

In this opinion, action, and decision of the joint convention, that there was no election, we concur. It is not conceived how 15 can be a majority of 30.

That a majority of all the members of the legislature is necessary to a choice when all are present and voting we think is clear, not only from the act of July 25, 1866, but from the language of the Constitution itself upon this subject, prescribing that "two Senators from each State shall be chosen by the legislature." Such a choice is made by preference and is only indicated by a number of votes greater than that cast for all or any others voted for.

OBJECTIONS TO THE VALIDITY OF THE ACTION AND VOTE OF THE SPEAKER OF THE SENATE.

The record shows that Hon. Mr. Watson, the speaker of the senate, appeared, qualified, and took his seat in the senate on the first day of the session, without protest or objection, and continued to act as a senator and as speaker of the senate, whenever he was present, up to the time of the final adjournment.

The action of the senate in allowing him to be qualified and seated as a senator from the county of Kent was in effect an adjudication of the most public and solemn character that he was a senator, a member of the senate, and entitled to act as such. Such adjudication remains unchanged. There are only three ways in which he could lose or be deprived of his right to vote or act as a senator, and, by consequence, of his right to vote and act as a member of the joint convention. One of these is the act of God—death; the second by his own act—resignation; the third is by the action of the senate adjudging the vacation of his seat, either by ouster or expulsion, for such causes as the senate of the State of Delaware might adjudge sufficient to disqualify him as a senator. There has been neither death, resignation, nor adverse adjudication in his case, and he remains in all respects a senator, as fully qualified and as lawfully entitled to act as such as upon the day when he first appeared and was sworn as a senator.

It is claimed that when the exercise of the office of governor devolved upon him as speaker of the senate, that, ipso facto, he lost the office and rights of such senator; that these dual functions are incompatible.

We think it clear, from the language of the constitution of the State of Delaware, that these dual functions are expressly made compatible and competent by the terms of that instrument. We do not think incompatibility, in legal terms or effect, such as to oust a man from one office and to confer upon him another, is to be derived from general considerations resting in nubibus; but that such incompatibility must be plainly inferred from the text of the constitution or statutes of the State or Government to be affected thereby.

Besides this, nothing is more familiar to us in American legislation than the enactment of statutes in contravention of the common law. Statutes in aid of the common law are quite frequent, but we think that statutes in contravention thereof are more numerous.

It was formerly held at common law that one could not be a witness in any case where he had a pecuniary interest. The common law held that there was a sharp and natural incompatibility, founded upon grounds of the highest public policy, between the two positions of a witness in a cause and an interested party therein. In direct contradiction to this principle, and in complete neutralization of its effect, statutes now provide that the parties in suits, and all others, notwithstanding their interest therein, may testify as witnesses. So that the question is not what may be incompatible at common law, but what is the statute in any given case. The statute takes the place of the common law and abrogates it.

The constitution of the State of Delaware is a statute of the highest character, enacted by the people themselves.

It was entirely competent for the makers of that instrument, and for the people in its adoption, to abrogate any common law incompatibility, if such existed, and to make it competent that the speaker of the senate should, notwithstanding any natural or common-law incompatibility, take upon himself for the time "the exercise of the office of governor," still retaining his office of senator and speaker. In any conceivable case the common law must yield to the statute—much more must it give way to a constitutional enactment.

The constitution of Delaware does not provide that the speaker of the senate, on the death of the governor, shall either be or become governor, but only that such speaker "shall exercise the office of governor." It does not provide that he shall in such an event cease to be speaker, or cease to be senator, or that a vacancy exists in either position; and we do not think that we can amend the constitution of a State by the process of an argument in a contested seat here.

Not only is no vacancy created in such instance by the devolution of "the exercise of the office of governor" upon the speaker of the senate, but the constitution of the State expressly provides that "each house, whose speaker shall exercise the office of governor, may choose a speaker pro tempore"—that is, a temporary speaker to preside in the room of the permanent speaker when he may be absent, thus plainly implying that there is no vacancy in the office of speaker, and that there is no vacancy in the office of senator or representative (as no one could be speaker except a member of one of the houses) by this devolution of the exercise of the office of governor.

In section 14 of the constitution, where it is provided that the speaker of the house "shall exercise the office of governor" if there be no speaker of the senate, the distinction between the speaker of either house exercising the office of governor, and the governor as such, is very clearly implied in the phrase, "until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified." And in the same section, afterwards, the person elected governor is distinguished from the temporary occupant exercising the office of governor by the recurrence three times of the phrase, "the person who exercises the office of governor." And when the contingency arises of a vacancy in the office of governor, and there be no other person who can exercise the office of governor within the provisions of the constitution, the general assembly shall proceed to elect "a person to exercise the office of governor until a governor elected by the people shall be qualified."

This person so chosen is not called governor, but a "person to exercise the office of governor."

And when, in the case of a contested election, some one is to be designated to perform gubernatorial duties, it is provided "that the speaker of the senate or the speaker of the house who may then be in the exercise of executive authority" shall continue therein until a determination of the contest. It is manifestly expressed that the person exercising the executive authority is not the governor, but that he is, and remains, and must continue to be, speaker of the senate, or speaker of the house, notwithstanding the fact that the "exercise of the office of governor" may for the time being devolve upon him.

If this interpretation of the constitution of the State were at all doubtful, it is abundantly sustained by practical, contemporaneous, and continuous construction in the actual administration of the government of Delaware. Three persons, upon each of whom at different times devolved, under this clause, the exercise of the office of governor (John Sykes, Jacob Stout, and Caleb Rodney), speakers of the senate, who temporarily exercised the executive authority as such speakers, after they had exercised the office of governor ad interim, returned to the senate and served out the terms for which they had been elected as senators in the senate. No suggestion was made that they had vacated their office as senators or had become governors of the State of Delaware by reason of the temporary exercise of executive duties imposed upon them by section 14, article 3, of the constitution.

As to the provisions of section 2, article 12, of the constitution, and section 5 of article 3, we think there is no real conflict between them and the other provisions cited as to the succession of the executive authority.

One of the main provisions in the constitution of Delaware, declared and provided for by three fundamental clauses in the instrument, is that in certain contingencies the speaker of the senate "shall exercise the office of governor" for the time being therein designated. To say that a provision that no senator shall be governor, or that no governor shall be senator at the same time is not in any conflict with the provisions for the temporary exercise of the executive authority by the speakers of either house.

Section 12 of article 2 and section 5 of article 3 evidently relate to the regular elective term of the offices therein named, and provide that such official terms of these positions shall not be held by the same person at the same time. They do not at all relate to casual vacancies in the executive office or to the constitutional means of supplying them. As these two sections contain no allusion to temporary vacancies, so they are not and can not be in conflict with the provisions of the instrument elsewhere appearing intended to provide for such contingencies.

Besides, we understand it to be well-settled law that the different clauses of a written instrument, even those of an ordinary contract, must be always construed so as to be consistent with each other. With such a grave public State paper as the constitution of Delaware the rule is yet more imperative. We submit, therefore, that a proposed construction of this constitution which makes a direct and unavoidable conflict and contradiction between the clauses and sections of the same must be false and unfounded.

It is not to be presumed, and indeed it is in our view preposterous, that the people of that State should have placed in their organic law contradictory provisions on any subject.

WHO ARE LAWFUL JUDGES OF QUALIFICATIONS AND INCOMPATIBILITY

The senate of the State of Delaware is made by law the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members. In the case presented by Mr. Du Pont against the legality of the vote of Mr. Speaker Watson as a member of the joint convention, no question is made as to the election and return of Mr. Watson as a senator. The whole case rests upon the question of his qualifications. And even upon the subject of qualification it is not denied that at the time he took his seat in the senate he was fully and legally qualified to act and vote therein. But it is earnestly insisted that after he had taken his seat he did and performed certain acts and duties which deprived him of his legal qualifications, and had rendered him unqualified, disqualified, and incompetent to vote or act as a member of the senate or of the joint convention.

This position of the claimant, Mr. Du Pont, raises the most serious question in this case, which is, as to who can lawfully decide and determine as to whether or not the acts of Mr. Speaker Watson referred to destroyed or suspended his qualifications as a senator, and by consequence as a member of the joint convention.

We think that the senate of the State of Delaware, whereof he was a member, is the sole tribunal which could either hear or determine lawfully these objections to the qualifications of Senator Watson.

It is charged that he was absent from the senate from the 9th day of April, 1895, until the day of the joint convention. If he were absent in discharge of any duties, executive or official, by the law of Delaware incompatible with the office of senator, or if his absence was contumacious and perverse, this might have constituted a cause for the judgment of the State senate for his ouster from the senate, his suspension as a senator, or the vacation of his seat. If, whether present or absent, during his term he had committed any act in violation of the laws and constitution of his State, or of the United States, this might have constituted a cause for the judgment of the State senate against him for his suspension or for his expulsion, the vacation of his seat and office, and for the issuing of a writ of election for the choice of his successor as senator from the county of Kent.

Causes for judgment of suspension, ouster, vacation, or expulsion against a sitting member or senator are not, however, well-founded judgments. They have legally none of the force or effect of judgments or adjudications. There is no judgment or adjudication shown in the record or journal of the senate of Delaware on any of these objections to the qualifications of Mr. Watson as a member of that body.

If these charges or objections to his qualifications had been presented and heard in the State senate and judgment of suspension, ouster, and vacation had been rendered against him, the case of Mr. Du Pont might have been fully made out. This Senate and court of the United States would have been bound thereby. If such a hearing had terminated in his favor, the same result would have followed. The judgment of the State senate is a finality.

As there was no hearing or judgment in respect to such charges in the State senate, the seat and office of Senator Watson remains undisturbed and unaffected thereby.

Because the State senate did not pass upon these charges or objections to the qualifications of their fellow-member, we in this body are not by law in any way authorized to take jurisdiction. We have no authority to originate, hear, or determine any objections to the qualifications of those who acted and voted as members of the senate of the State, or to revise or review their action or nonaction in the premises.

These considerations rest upon the great doctrine of the due distribution of powers and of the distinctive provinces of independent powers, to which the claimant in this case has so strongly appealed, and which we now justly invoke as showing the error of his position.

The constitution of Delaware, like that of the other States and of the United States, declares that "each house shall judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members."

Each House of Congress is a court in such cases for the judgment of its own members, but neither is a court or can be in any form a tribunal to judge of the qualifications of any member of the State legislature.

It would be just as reasonable and lawful that the State senate of Delaware should adjudge and decide a contested seat in this body from that State as that we should decide here a contested seat in the senate there.

Especially is this the law when it is sought by a kind of ex post facto sentence to unseat by a judgment of the United States Senate a member of the State senate of Delaware after he has acted and voted there.

The Senate of the United States has often considered and decided the question as to which of two bodies claiming to be the legislature of a State is a lawful legislature entitled to hold a joint convention for the election of a United States Senator. The members of this body, sitting as a court, as we are now sitting, has frequently decided as to two contesting branches of a legislature which was the lawful senate or house of the general assembly, but the Senate has always declined to take jurisdiction or to adjudicate the title of any individual member of the State legislature who acted and voted as such in the joint convention.

> In the opinion of your committee it is not competent for the Senate to inquire as to the right of individual members to sit in a legislature which is conceded to have a quorum in both houses of legally elected members. But, undoubtedly, the Senate must always inquire whether the body which pretended to elect the Senator was the legislature of the State or not, because a Senator can only be elected by the legislature of a State.

And the minority opinion in the same case, upon the same point, is as follows:

> Each house of the general assembly of Alabama is the exclusive judge of the election returns and qualifications of its members, and any inquiry into such question by the Senate of the United States would be as unwarranted by precedent as it would prove dangerous in practice.
> In a contest like the one now under consideration between two persons elected to the Senate by different bodies, each claiming to be the legislature of the State, the Senate may look into the constitution and laws of the State to ascertain which of the two bodies, if either, has been organized in conformity with their provisions, but it can not rightfully inquire into the election returns and qualifications of the members of either body.
> If the Senate could enter upon such inquiry, where would be the limitation upon its prerogatives? Could it not as legitimately inquire into the manner in which any election officer had performed the duties of his office, and even into the qualification of the electors who had voted for members of the State legislature?
> The undersigned would not restrict the Senate in its constitutional right to judge of the election returns and qualifications of its own members, but would regret its assumption of powers belonging exclusively to the two Houses of the State legislature. (Sykes vs. Spencer, page 528.)

The case of Sykes against Spencer was heard and determined in 1873 and the principle thus decided has been constantly adhered to since that time. In that case no action or adjudication had taken place upon the contested cases of individual members subsequent to their admission, and the decision of the minority and majority upon this point rests upon the action and recognition of persons voting in the joint convention as members of either the senate or house, and consequently of the legislature.

In the case of David Turpie, decided in May, 1888, the same point is decided where there had been an adjudication by the Indiana State senate unseating one of its members and seating a contestant. This Senate decided that it would not revise such adjudication—that it would not inquire into the motives or purposes of the adjudication.

> The committee are of the opinion that the facts offered, if proved, will not warrant the Senate in declaring the sitting member not entitled to his seat. There can be no doubt that the body in question was the constitutional senate of Indiana.
> The journals of both houses of the legislature of the State have been submitted to us. It appears that the body was recognized as the senate by the governor and by the house of representatives. Statutes to which its constitutional assent was necessary were enacted and have become part of the law of the State.
> We also think that the judgment of the senate of Indiana as to the title of Messrs. Branahan and McDonald, the two members in question, to their seats is binding upon the Senate of the United States. This body is made by the Constitution the judge of the election, qualifications, and returns of its members. The senate of Indiana is likewise the judge of the election, qualifications, and returns of its own members. We must determine all questions arising out of the proceedings of the electors. But who sustain the characters of electors is to be determined by the legislative body of the State.
> We can not inquire into the motives which control its judgment. In rendering that judgment, whether it shall give a hearing to parties, permit debate, examine witnesses, act upon evidence or without evidence, are matters within its own discretion. If that discretion were exercised in the manner charged by the remonstrance, a majority think that a public crime was committed, for which the offenders are responsible to the people of Indiana. But we can not try the question. (Case of David Turpie, page 625.)

It is thus made very plain that the common law of the United States Senate is well settled. When the title of an individual member of the legislature who has once been seated has been determined by a subsequent adjudication of the house to which he belongs, such judgment will not be here disturbed or inquired into. And if there has been no such subsequent adjudication by the State senate or house, the title of the senator or representative rests upon the record of his original credentials and qualifications as a member, and will not here be questioned.

When a person claiming to be a member of the legislative body presents his credentials of election, and the record shows that he was thereupon admitted to a seat and sworn in as a member of the same, his title to the seat is absolute, unquestioned, and so continues until the house of which he is a member has adjudicated that he is not entitled to his seat, or that some other person is entitled thereto. Such is the decision of the Senate in the following case:

> The majority of persons having a right to seats in the house of representatives have a right to organize that house and to transact all its lawful business, including the enactment of laws and the election of Senators. Persons who have the certificates of election have such right to seats. Every act of the assembly in which they take part, and to which their consent is necessary, has as absolute validity as if their title had been affirmed by an adjudication of the house itself. Their title is not, as is sometimes carelessly said, a prima facie title. It is an absolute title, continuing until the house itself has adjudicated that some other person be admitted to their place. This adjudication is only operative for the future, and has no retroactive effect whatever. When the house makes the inquiry on the merits, it may treat the credentials as prima facie evidence upon that question. But until the house tries the case the credential is conclusive to all the world. (Case of Clark and Maginnis vs. Sanders and Power, page 637.)

These decisions and judgment of the Senate are founded upon the principle that the States, by constitutional ordinances, have made each house of the State legislature the judges of the elections and qualifications of their own members; it is ultra vires of our powers to revise, review, consider, or pass upon any questions of this character.

If the senate of Delaware had made any adjudication upon the objections alleged against the qualifications of Mr. Speaker Watson, we would have been bound by such adjudication, whether adverse or favorable to his title. If they made none, this does not give the United States Senate any authority to adjudge the case. The jurisdiction of the two houses of the State legislatures, by their own authority, is original and exclusive.

These constitutional enactments have such effect as not only to make the members of each house the judges in each case, but also to forbid that the members of any other tribunal shall be judges therein.

The evidence in this case shows that William T. Watson, on the first Tuesday in January, 1893, held credentials signed and certified by the sheriff of the county of Kent, in the State of Delaware, and by the inspectors of the elections in said county, showing that he had been duly elected senator from said county at the general election held in November, 1892, in said county, for the term of four years—that is, until November, 1896.

The record of the journal of the senate of the State of Delaware shows that on the first Tuesday of January, 1893, aforesaid, the day fixed by law for the meeting of the general assembly, William T. Watson, aforesaid, appeared and presented this certificate of election as the credentials of his seat and title as a senator.

The journal shows that these credentials were read and spread at large upon the record of that day, and that thereupon he, the said Watson, was sworn and admitted as a senator. Mr. Watson yet holds these credentials; the record thereof and the proceedings thereupon are yet remaining, and these credentials so remaining of record are, as is said in the case of Clark and Maginnis vs.

Sanders and Power, an absolute title, and they continue to be a full, complete, and absolute title until the senate of Delaware has for some cause pronounced and adjudged them to be no longer valid.

As the senate of the State of Delaware were lawfully, in the first instance, the exclusive judges of the validity of these credentials, so they continue to be the exclusive judges of their invalidity, if from any cause whatever disqualifications have occurred which might vitiate or destroy their legality. Any adjudication by the Senate of the United States upon such a subject is beyond our province. Such action upon our part would be an intrusion, an interference, an unwarrantable usurpation of power vested in another body, ruinous to the autonomy of the States, and disastrous to the character of this body, whose members purport not to be chosen by their own action, but by that of the legislatures of the States.

There is not and has not been up to this day any adjudication by the senate of the State of Delaware adverse to the title of Mr. Watson as a member of that body. A careful search and inspection of the record and journal of the State senate shows no such adjudication. It could only be shown by the record.

The journal does show, as above recited, that he was admitted, sworn, and seated upon his aforesaid credentials. It shows that he was afterwards chosen speaker of the senate; that he continued to act as senator and as speaker whenever he was present, up to and including the last day of the session, when both houses adjourned sine die; that during the entire session, whenever he was present, he voted and acted as a senator in the joint convention of the two houses, and acted as presiding officer of such convention.

If the senate of the State of Delaware were to-day convened, and had adjudged in this case in hearing before them that Mr. Watson's seat was, for any or all of the causes alleged in the claim of Mr. Du Pont, vacant, and that he was no longer a senator, such a judgment at this time could not affect in any manner his action or vote in the senate or joint convention while he acted as a senator.

No one would contend for a moment that such a judgment is retroactive. The acts of the senator de facto are as valid as if de jure. How much less could any adjudication in this body at this time legally invalidate his former vote, seat, or title as a senator.

We therefore conclude in this case—

First. That if there be any questions as to the lawful qualifications of William T. Watson to act and vote as a senator and, by consequence, as a member of the joint convention, this is not the place, the time, or the tribunal to either hear or determine such questions.

Second. The senate of the State of Delaware had paramount and exclusive jurisdiction to adjudge such questions, and whether they exercised such jurisdiction or not, the Senate of the United States has no jurisdiction in the premises.

Third. That Mr. Watson, having acted and voted as a senator and as a member of the joint convention at the time when the vote was taken under which Mr. Du Pont claims his election to a seat in this body, he is to be counted as a member of the legislature of Delaware in joint convention assembled; that the whole number of members voting, being the whole number of members of both houses, was 30; that Mr. Du Pont did not receive a majority of this whole number; that we can not make his vote of 15 a majority of such whole number by subtracting therefrom the vote of one whose right and title to vote is not shown by the record to have been adjudged against by the body of which he acted as a member.

Mr. FRYE. During the last Congress pretty serious charges were made against the Steamboat-Inspection Service by one of the New York daily papers. Those charges led me to make an investigation, a limited one, to be sure. I found that there were a great many laws obsolete, that there were other statutes which ought to be obsolete, and that there was a necessity for additional legislation. I found that the only justification for the causes of complaint arose, in my judgment, from the fact that the inspectors of hulls and boilers were made political officers; that they were appointed because they voted in one direction and were removed because they voted in another, which of course is utterly absurd in a service which has control of and care for the protection of human life at sea.

I called the attention of the Supervising Inspector-General, General Dumont, to these various matters which I had investigated, and I asked him to spend ample time and prepare a bill which would cover all of these points and whatever else he from his own experience could discover which needed reform. The bill which I hold in my hand is the result of his investigation and was prepared by him. I submit it to the Senate with the request that it be read twice and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (S. 2162) to amend certain sections of Title LII of the Revised Statutes, relating to steam vessels, and to codify therein all existing amendments to the same enacted by Congress since the close of the Forty-fourth Congress was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

R. 78) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to distribute the medals and diplomas awarded by the World's Columbian Commission to the exhibitors entitled thereto; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Select Committee on International Expositions.

Mr. DANIEL introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 79) directing the Secretary of War to furnish an estimate for deepening the channel from Hampton Roads to the navy-yard at Norfolk, Va., and also for improving the Western Branch of the Elizabeth River; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was Ordered, That the papers in regard to the bill in behalf of Charles P. Allison be withdrawn from the files of the Senate under the rules of the Senate.

SACRAMENTO RIVER IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. PERKINS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Whereas Congress on August 18, 1894, passed an act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; and

Whereas it was provided that no preliminary examination or survey for new works other than those designated in said act should be made; and

Whereas it was further provided that after the regular report on any examination or survey shall be submitted no supplemental report or estimate for the same fiscal year shall be made without a resolution of Congress; and

Whereas since the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, made his report on the Sacramento River, California, great floods have occurred, washing away the banks of that stream, creating crevasses through which the water finds its way to the lowlands, leaving the bed of a portion of the river nearly dry, and thereby rendering navigation difficult and at low water almost impossible: Therefore

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, directed to inquire as to the present condition of said Sacramento River and the effect upon navigation of the recent floods therein, and to estimate the cost of such improvements as may be necessary to restore said river to its natural channel and to report generally as to the nature and extent of such work as in his opinion the circumstances of the case require.

A. H. LAZARE.

Mr. GORDON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether the Republic of Haiti has paid the amount heretofore found to be due by said Republic to A. H. Lazare, a citizen of the United States, said amount found due by the Hon. William Strong, justice of the United States Supreme Court, in his award as arbitrator.

INVESTIGATION BY COMMITTEE ON PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. GEAR. I wish to make a brief statement in regard to a resolution introduced by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] and considered a day or two ago at a time when I was unavoidably absent. The resolution was referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads, of which I am chairman. In the course of his remarks the Senator from Nebraska spoke as follows:

I have noticed by the press from time to time that the Committee on Pacific Railroads has had certain witnesses before them for examination, and I hope the committee will not construe my words as any reflection upon them when I say that I have failed to observe that any of the patrons of the road have been brought before the committee and examined. Their examinations thus far seem to have been confined to stockholders and bondholders of the road, and their agents and attorneys, who come here for the purpose of being heard.

I wish to say in regard to these hearings that a full general notice has been given to all parties in interest. The notice of the hearings, the information as to the hearings, was published in all the daily press from ocean to ocean. Every person, whether he may be a bondholder, a stockholder, or a patron of the road, has had full and ample notice of the hearings. I do not know of any other way to give the information desired. In all the committees in the other branch of Congress of which I had the honor to be a member, and which have covered investigations of great magnitude lasting for months, it is the only way in which notice has been given so that the parties in interest might come before the committee and state their case, and that is the way the information was given in this case.

I wish to add, in addition, that no one has been requested to come before the committee except two gentlemen who will be here in the course of time. Certain gentlemen in New York representing the revisory board on the proposed reorganization of the Union Pacific Railroad came of their own accord to present their scheme to Congress, which is being entertained and will be entertained by that committee. Gentlemen not connected with these roads in any capacity whatever, but connected with other roads, have come of their own accord before the committee.

I simply wished to call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to this fact, so that he and the country may know that everybody had the proper notice.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, just one word. I think the chairman of the Committee on Pacific Railroads has not anticipated fully the meaning of what I said, and I want to repeat it now so that there may be no mistake as to my position. The Committee on Pacific Railroads, as I am informed, has sent out no invitation to any person to appear before the committee except to one or two persons who have already appeared.

Mr. GEAR. That is a mistake. The Senator certainly did not understand what I said. A general notice was given through the Associated Press dispatches to everybody who wished to come before the committee. The committee sent out no specific notice to anybody.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not think we ought to be confined to the Associated Press. At the city of Omaha is the third if not the second largest packing house and stock yards in the world. At the city of Omaha, which is a city of almost 200,000 people, is a board of trade, a board of commerce, and an association of wholesale merchants. At the city of Denver and other cities there are like institutions. These patrons of these roads ought not to be invited to come here simply by a dispatch sent out by the Associated Press or the United Press, but they ought to have a special invitation from the committee either to send a representative here to lay their claims before the committee or to furnish to the committee, in document form, valuable information which is in their possession.

Mr. GEAR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. GEAR. What information has the Senator that the gentlemen in Omaha to whom he refers, with whom I am personally well acquainted, want to come before the committee, may I ask?

Mr. ALLEN. I infer that the patrons of the road——

Mr. GEAR. The Senator simply infers that he knows.

Mr. ALLEN. No; I do not infer that I know. I know.

Mr. GEAR. The committee know——

Mr. ALLEN. I know; I live in that country; I am acquainted with those people, and I know their wishes as expressed to me hundreds and thousands of times.

Mr. GEAR. I live in that country myself, and know something of those people.

Mr. ALLEN. I know the Senator lives in the West.

Mr. GEAR. But I have no specific knowledge that any man on the line of these roads from Council Bluffs to Sacramento wishes to come before the committee. Certainly the Senator does not expect the committee to send notices broadcast to individuals all over that country, not knowing whether or not they may be patrons of the road.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not expect anything of the kind.

Mr. GEAR. They have had the ordinary notice, and the only notice they can have.

Mr. ALLEN. The honorable Senator does not live in that country. I know where he lives. I have known him for thirty-five years. He lives about half a mile west of the Mississippi River, hardly that far, at the city of Burlington, when he is at home. He lives 300 miles east of the eastern terminus of the Union Pacific Railroad, which terminates about two miles and a half on the east side of the Missouri River.

I know very well that there are associations of merchants and shippers of all kinds in the State of Nebraska who are vitally affected by the action to be taken by Congress upon the Pacific railroads, to whom the honorable Senator admits that no special invitation has been extended to appear here by representative or to furnish the information that may be in their possession relative to their wishes or relative to the condition of these roads.

Mr. GEAR. Will the honorable Senator state how notice is to be given to those people?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, I could state how, and very easily. The State Farmers' Alliance of the State of Nebraska has much valuable information in its possession, gathered through reliable sources, as to the effect of the present rates upon the farmers of the State of Nebraska and other States of the West. Why not address a letter to the presidents of the State farmers' alliances of the State of Nebraska and to the farmers' alliances in the States of Kansas and Colorado and ask them to lay before the committee the information they have?

Mr. GEAR. I will state that the committee does not know of any such organization. The committee have no official knowledge of any such organization.

Mr. ALLEN. That will not do, Mr. President. The committee have actual knowledge.

Mr. GEAR. That is a mistake.

Mr. ALLEN. It will not do to stand here and say that the committee has no official knowledge. It is a matter of common history that we have a national alliance, that met in this city two weeks ago.

Mr. GEAR. Let me say that it is a matter of common history that those people have had notice through the daily press, and they read the papers, as I know.

Mr. ALLEN. They may have had notice through the daily press, but even the notice that has gone out through the daily press has not specifically invited these men and the farmers' organizations to appear.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Why does not the Senator from Nebraska state that the hearings are now going on and are open to everybody? The Senator from Nebraska need not be afraid that any class of men who have any special scheme or any special information which they desire to present will fail to come here at their own expense and be present at the hearings before the committee. We have had propositions presented to the committee to take these bonds and transfer them to a new line of road, which the Government was to build from North Platte to Sioux City, Iowa.

If the Senator is of the opinion that anybody is being shut out from the committee hearings, if he will notify the representatives of the Farmers' Alliance and others who have propositions to present to the committee, there will be plenty of time for them to come and be heard. I know the Senator desires that we shall get through with the hearings in time to make some kind of a report. He does not expect us to summon these people at Government expense, and so far as the members of the Farmers' Alliance are concerned they would probably repudiate the idea of coming to Washington at Government expense. They have the opportunity of coming and of being heard, but the Senate is not called upon to give specific notice to the whole United States, individually and personally, that there is a hearing going on.

Mr. GEAR. Let me say to the Senator from Colorado that the committee is not empowered by this body to summon persons here at Government expense, but they have the right to come.

One more word in regard to these hearings. I had the honor of being on a committee in the other House that had hearings for five months, and there were probably 1,500 people, more or less, perhaps more, who came before that committee just in the way these notices have been given—by invitation in the press—and they came from California, from Maine, and from every State in the Union to make their case before that committee. I have many friends in the State of the Senator, I am glad to say, and I probably know almost as many people in that State as the Senator himself. They have the same opportunity to come as have others, and they will be heard with the same cordial attention we give to everybody else.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, that will not do, nor will the suggestion of the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], although it is couched in words which carry with them a slight insinuation against the Farmers' Alliance.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Not the slightest. I have the highest regard for that organization.

Mr. ALLEN. There has been no invitation extended to any person except to the representatives of the railroad interests. I do not say that for the purpose of reflecting on the committee at all, but I say the only persons at least who have come here have been Mr. Collis P. Huntington, Mr. Pierce, and other gentlemen who are representing the financial interests of these railroad companies.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Oh, no. The Senator never intentionally makes a misstatement.

Mr. ALLEN. Who are they?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Coombs, who represents Sioux City and that great section of the Northwest, wants the Government to go into the building of another road from North Platte——

Mr. ALLEN. Where does Mr. Coombs live?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not know. He lives all over, I suppose.

Mr. ALLEN. He lives in Boston, I think.

Mr. GEAR. I will tell the Senator where Mr. Coombs lives, and who his clients are. Mr. Coombs lives, as I understand, in the city of Brooklyn, and his clients are 400 bankers, scattered in every State of this Union, who have invested money in northwest Iowa and northeast Nebraska, who have been interested in building a railroad to Sioux City, which has cost $2,500,000. He comes here now of his own accord, in response to the public notice given, and makes certain propositions before the committee. He is not interested in the Pacific railroads to the extent of a penny, or in their transportation, or anything of the kind.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know where Mr. Coombs lives, but I know what his business is. He is a broker.

Mr. FRYE. Oh, no.

Mr. ALLEN. I know that Mr. Coombs represents a great many bankers in the northeastern portion of this country, and represents the financial interests of a great many people in these railroads.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Coombs is one of the best-known lawyers in all New England, and one of the best.

Mr. ALLEN. He is a lawyer and a broker. I do not care whether he is a lawyer or not. That does not make him any better or any worse, for that matter. I know he represents here 140 different banks.

Mr. FRYE. Over 200.

Mr. ALLEN. In what is called the Credit Commutations Company.

Mr. FRYE. Certainly, but as a lawyer.

Mr. ALLEN. His being a lawyer is a side issue with him. He is a financial lawyer. I do not think he has ever tried many causes.

Mr. HOAR. I know Mr. Coombs very well.

Mr. ALLEN. That man is the representative of the financial interests of these railroads, and his representation is strictly in line with the representation of Mr. Huntington, Mr. Pierce, and other gentlemen of that kind.

Mr. GEAR. One word. I beg to state that the Senator is laboring under a gross mistake. Mr. Coombs is not the representative of any of the Pacific railroads. Mr. Coombs is before the Pacific Railroads Committee asking this Congress to appropriate money out of the sinking fund, which has accrued to the Government under law from those roads, to construct a road 250 miles in a southwest direction from Sioux City to connect with the main line of the Union Pacific.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator diverts me; but let me call his attention to the fact that either Mr. Coombs represents some financial interest in this road or he represents the patrons of the road; and I will say that he does not represent a solitary patron of the road. What he wants is that this Government——

Mr. BRICE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him at that point to correct him?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. BRICE. Mr. Coombs does not represent any Pacific railroad, or any investment heretofore made in any Pacific railroad, or any financial institution, or any persons who are concerned in any way with the stocks, bonds, securities, or other properties in the Union Pacific or any other Pacific railroad.

Mr. ALLEN. What does he represent?

Mr. BRICE. He represents an investment in the northeastern corner of the Senator's State and represents an investment in the northwestern corner of the State of Iowa; he represents a bridge which has just been built from Iowa to Nebraska, and he asks that the sinking fund belonging to the Government be contributed to his people for the development of the State of the Senator from Nebraska and the State of Iowa.

Mr. GEAR. May I add to what the Senator from Ohio has said, that Mr. Coombs asks this in the name of the Farmers' Alliance of the State which the Senator from Nebraska represents on this floor?

Mr. ALLEN. I am inclined to believe the honorable Senator from Iowa on almost all occasions, and I do not want to express any doubt of his veracity upon this occasion, but I should need corroborative proof of the fact that Mr. Coombs represents the Farmers' Alliance.

Mr. GEAR. I will refer the Senator to the printed testimony taken before the committee.

Mr. ALLEN. It may be Mr. Coombs's testimony.

Mr. FRYE. Allow me to say that Mr. Coombs appears practically in opposition to any of the proposed settlements with the Pacific railroad companies, and argues against any of the proposed settlements with those companies, unless the law by which the settlement is provided for shall compel the Union Pacific and Central Pacific railroad companies to permit a union southwest at the one hundredth meridian, and at the same time that they shall be compelled practically to assist him in completing the southwest connection between Sioux City and the one hundredth parallel, which they do not want to do.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I want to answer the interrogatories which have been put to me by Senators as briefly as possible, for I have no desire to consume the time of the Senate in needless discussion.

The Senator from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Pacific Railroads [Mr. GEAR], supplemented by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], says that what Mr. Coombs wants—and they are not sufficiently satisfactory nor lucid in their explanation of whether he is a patron of the road or not—is that a sufficient amount of the earnings of these roads shall be set apart for the construction of a line of railway from Sioux City, Iowa, to near the city of Kearney, in the State of Nebraska, to intersect with the main line of the Union Pacific at that point; but these Senators are singularly silent upon the question why that road was not constructed in 1867 under the act of 1864, which provided for its construction upon exactly that line.

No, Mr. President, that involves the integrity of the Republican party or the Republican Administration in carrying into execution that law. The law expressly provided, and provides to-day, for the construction of that line from Sioux City, Iowa, to the hundredth meridian, a little west of the present city of Kearney, in the State of Nebraska. No attempt was ever made to construct it there, and the people of that country for twenty-odd years have been deprived of the benefit to be derived from the construction of that road in consequence of its diversion. The honorable chairman of the Pacific Railroads Committee knows quite well that that road was diverted from the original line of its construction to be a road from Sioux City to Missouri Valley, in the State of Iowa, on the east side of the Missouri River. Now, Mr. Coombs comes here, so we are told, as a representative of the Farmers' Alliance. He is not the representative of any alliance in this Union, national, State, or local.

Mr. GEAR. I beg pardon of the Senator for interrupting him. I did not mean to state that he came here as the representative of the Farmers' Alliance, but that he came here practically in the interest of the people of the farming community, who are generally supposed to be members of the order to which the Senator refers.

Mr. ALLEN. He did not come here in the interest of the people of that order or the people of the State of Nebraska or of any other State. He came here in the interest of the Credit Commutations Company, which holds securities to the amount of several hundred thousand dollars, if not several million dollars, arising out of the construction of the new bridge at Sioux City. He wants, in the interest of that bridge company, a road constructed from Sioux City to Kearney, so that it may be tributary to the bridge represented by his clients. He is not concerned in the sod houses of Nebraska.

Mr. GEAR. Does not the Senator think that if the road were built in that direction, through that great rich portion of the State he represents so well, it would be a great thing for the Farmers' Alliance?

Mr. ALLEN. Of course I do.

Mr. GEAR. Of which I suppose the Senator is a member?

Mr. ALLEN. No, I am not a member of it.

Mr. GEAR. The Senator ought to be.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish I was.

Mr. GEAR. The Senator is not eligible.

Mr. ALLEN. I should consider myself as highly honored by being a member of that organization as I consider myself honored now.

Mr. GEAR. The Senator is not eligible by virtue of his profession, as I understand.

Mr. ALLEN. I think I am eligible. I am a farmer, and all I have is in farms.

I think that part of the State of Nebraska would be benefited, and I should be glad to see the construction of a road there, although we have one road running to the southwest now.

But that is no answer to the point I make that the Republican Administration, which had it in its power to compel the construction of that road twenty-odd years ago, failed to do so, and now, when it advances the interests of the clients of Mr. Coombs in the Sioux City Bridge Company, then Mr. Coombs comes here as the ostensible representative of the horny-fisted granger to have that road constructed. That is all there is to that.

What I wanted to say, and what I wanted to emphasize, was this: The Committee on Pacific Railroads will have failed to perform its duty, in my judgment—and that may count for nothing, and it probably does—if it fails to send to the organized farmers of the States whose interests are affected by the operations of these roads an invitation to come here by representative, or to send the valuable information they have gathered up in the form of documents, and place these things before the committee for its information.

What is to be said of the great stockyards that furnish so much transportation to these companies? What is to be said of the wholesale merchants of Iowa and the wholesale merchants of the States of Nebraska, Colorado, and Kansas, whose interests are so vitally affected by the solution of this problem? The committee will have failed to discharge its duty, in my judgment, unless it directs its clerk to send to the officers of these associations and companies a specific request to appear before the committee or to furnish it with the valuable information they possess.

I want to say, Mr. President, that, in my judgment, the Pacific Railroads Committee can not hide its action, actual or proposed, behind the assumption that it has sent out by the Associated and United Press agencies a general invitation to everybody to appear and worship at their shrine.

Mr. HOAR. I want to make one statement, if I may. I understand the universal custom in the Senate, since I have been a member of it, is that when there is pending before any committee of the body a matter in which the constituents of any Senator are interested, if he thinks they ought to be summoned, he informs them that the hearing is going on, and he finds out the time when they can be heard, and makes the arrangements for them to appear. I have done that in a great many matters in which people in my own State were interested, and should have felt myself derelict in duty if I had not done so.

Mr. GEAR. The Senator has stated the precedents exactly. The committee gave this notice, understanding and expecting that Senators who had friends who wished to appear before the committee would notify them. Notice that the hearing has been going on has been generally disseminated all over the country, and the persons referred to by the Senator from Nebraska have not appeared.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 5819) to provide for the examination and classification of certain lands in the State of California was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4321) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes, and asking a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments to the bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives and agree to the conference asked for by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. HALE, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

ALLEGED ASSESSMENTS IN THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER], coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PEFFER February 12, 1896, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire and report whether, during the year 1895, or any portion thereof, any of the employees of the Post-Office Department, while receiving pay from appropriations for that Department, did, with the knowledge, connivance, or direction of any clerk or clerks, or chief or chiefs of division, levy and collect assessments of money on and from other employees of the Department to be used, and which was used, for political purposes in States where election campaigns were in progress at that time; whether any person or persons were employed and borne on the Department rolls as employees and regularly paid as such who, while pretending to be discharging the duties of inspectors in the free-delivery service, were in fact actively engaged in aiding and assisting one of the political parties in said election campaign; whether, during such time, in room 3 of the Interior Department building, or in any other room or rooms in said building or in any other building, any employee of the Department was directing or managing the employment of persons for the purposes aforesaid and receiving and disbursing the moneys so assessed and collected, and whether such manager or director kept an account of such moneys in his own name in any bank of the city of Washington or elsewhere.

The committee will inquire and report, further, whether during the period covered by this resolution any person or persons were employed by any clerk or chief of division in the Post-Office Department and kept on the Department pay rolls and paid out of the Department funds, which payment was not authorized by law or by any lawful rule or regulation of the Department, and for which services no appropriation had been made by Congress

Mr. PEFFER. Let that resolution go over, Mr. President, retaining its place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered, in the absence of objection.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF BOND SALES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER], coming over from a previous day; which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PEFFER February 12, 1896, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators, not more than two of whom shall belong to one political party, shall be appointed by the Vice-President, whose duty it shall be—

First. To investigate and report generally all material facts and circumstances connected with the sale of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury in the years 1894, 1895, and 1896.

Second. To investigate and report specially what amount of available funds, classified, was in the United States Treasury and on deposit in other places, subject to the order of the Secretary of the Treasury, at the time the bonds were sold or offered for sale; whether there was or was not coin enough on hand to meet all coin obligations of the Government due at the time said bonds were sold or when they were offered for sale; what obligations were due at that time and the amount of each, stated separately; what was the reason for any unusual withdrawal of coin from the Treasury shortly before bonds were sold or offered for sale, if such unusual withdrawals were in fact made, and by what persons or classes of persons and for what purpose or on what account such withdrawals were made; who purchased the bonds, in what amounts, and where, whether in the United States or in foreign countries, and in what proportions, and from what persons or classes of persons the gold was procured with which to pay for the bonds; what the bonds sold for, and what was the market price of our Government bonds at the time, and what effect the bond sales had on the credit and business of the people of the United States.

Third. To investigate and report as to the manner of disposing of said bonds, by what authority, and what contracts, advertisements, or proposals were made by the Secretary of the Treasury in relation thereto; what agreements or contracts, and whether oral or in writing, and whether publicly or privately and secretly, were entered into by the Secretary of the Treasury and any other person or persons with respect to the sale and purchase of the bonds; whether any officer of the Government, or any person or persons for such officer and on his behalf and in his personal interest, and with his knowledge or consent, entered into any contract, agreement, or arrangement, directly or indirectly, with any person or persons, partnership, corporation, company, or syndicate, for the purpose of affecting the price offered or to be offered for said bonds or any of them, with the intent and expectation to receive commission or personal reward by reason of such contract, agreement, or arrangement; whether such contract or agreement had any and what effect on the prices offered for the bonds, what the effect was, and who, if any person, profited by it and to what extent.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask the privilege of making two or three slight amendments to the resolution. On page 1, line 1, after the word "Senators," strike out the words "not more than two of whom shall belong to one political party"; on page 2, line 19, after the word "privately," strike out the words "and secretly"; in line 20, after the word "any," strike out the word "other" and insert "syndicate or," and in line 21, after the word "bonds," insert "and the profits made or to be made by such syndicate, or other person or persons connected with such syndicate, directly or indirectly."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas has the right to modify his resolution, and it will be modified in the manner suggested by him.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, it is my recollection that the chairman of the Committee on Finance, whom I do not now see in the Senate, made a motion to refer this resolution to the Committee on Finance. Am I correct in that?

Mr. PEFFER. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that that motion was made out of order. The resolution under the rule would go over to the next day, and I asked to have that done. The motion of the Senator from Vermont to refer was made in connection with that. I had the right to have the resolution go over, and under the rule it would go over anyway; and that was the order made by the Chair, as appears by the RECORD.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. The motion to refer, I think, was properly made when the resolution was offered, and that motion would go over with the resolution.

Mr. PEFFER. The order was made that the resolution should go over.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] is not present, but I feel bound to say that the Committee on Finance, this matter being pending here, has thought it best, on reflection, that the resolution should be sent to that committee. No doubt a subcommittee of that committee can be very readily formed and can make the investigation. It would cost much less in that way than to raise a special committee. It seems to me that a special committee for such a purpose as this should not be made. It appeared to the members of the Committee on Finance that the raising of a special committee might involve a very large amount of expense. I for one, whenever any intimation or insinuation or charge of impropriety is made against an officer of the Government, think it but right that it should be specially examined by the Senate or by the House of Representatives, properly by the House of Representatives, because that is the only body that can follow the examination by anything in the nature of punishment. But it seems to me that questions of this kind ought to be referred to the regular committees, and that we should not start a special committee to probably involve the Senate and the country in a very large expense. It is far better to present this matter to the committee having charge of the subject-matter, and which is familiar with all the details, for examination. Therefore, I think the resolution ought to be referred to the Committee on Finance. If the Senate is of the opinion that the state of public opinion would justify it on the facts which have been published, the Senate might proceed to examine So and so upon the various points named in the resolution, but it ought to be done by a regularly organized committee of the body.

Mr. PEFFER. Does the Senator make the motion to refer?

Mr. SHERMAN. It was made yesterday, as I understand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that no motion has yet been made to refer the resolution, the resolution not having been before the Senate. An objection was interposed when it was originally submitted, so that the motion to refer could not be entertained.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I submit a motion to refer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PEFFER. On that I desire to be heard.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, as I can not get the floor in any other way. I should like to know how I lost the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the inquiry of the Senator?

Mr. VEST. I should like to know how I lost the floor. I have been standing here attempting to proceed with my remarks, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has spoken, and now the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] wants to speak, and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER] will speak. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator had the floor I was unconscious of it, and I will make my apology to him.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is unable to give the Senator from Missouri the information he seeks. He certainly does not desire to take the Senator from the floor.

Mr. VEST. I am not making any specific charge, but I rise in the interest of the dignity and orderly conduct of the business of this body.

Now, I understand the Chair to rule, in reply to my inquiry—I suppose it is intended as a reply—that there has been no motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a motion to that effect now pending, made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. VEST. I asked the question whether the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], the chairman of the Committee on Finance, had not made that motion at the preceding session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion was made, but the resolution was not then before the Senate. An objection was interposed to its consideration when introduced, and it went over under the rule.

Mr. VEST. But the motion had been made before the resolution went over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion could not be entertained. The motion to refer is now in order, and it has been made by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. VEST. It is not a matter of any moment when the motion was made; but I understood—and that was the understanding of the Committee on Finance, and it was certainly the statement of the chairman—that he first made the motion to refer, and then some other Senator raised an objection to consideration, and the whole thing went over. Without being an expert in parliamentary law, it seems to me that motion also went over, but, as a matter of course, it is leather and prunella now, as the motion is pending.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has answered the inquiry as he understands the rules of the Senate to be.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, I, of course, am opposed to the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Finance, or I would have asked that reference in the beginning. While there is some force from the standpoint of the Senator from Ohio in his suggestion that the reference be made, yet the reason, and the only reason, that the Senator gives, is one that seems to me trivial, in view of the circumstances and in view of what I think to be really the Senator's meaning.

Of course there will be some expense attending the investigation. I think there will hardly be as much as eight or ten million dollars, however. That much has been expended already—wrongfully, unquestionably wrongfully—and has gone to a syndicate of speculators in New York City and their confrères on the other side of the water.

But without going into that branch of the subject now, I will say that this bond-selling business, as it has been conducted during the period covered by the resolution now before the Senate, is the most remarkable proceeding to be found in the nation's history, and the people do not understand it.

When, in the earlier years of the Republic, it became necessary to borrow money, Congress, in every case and in all cases, provided the appropriate legislation. Every Treasury note and every bond issued was authorized by laws passed for that special and particular purpose.

When the great war of the rebellion came, as we provided men we provided means for paying them. We authorized the issuing of paper money; we authorized the sale of bonds for coin; we authorized different methods of funding the rapidly increasing debt, and we empowered the Secretary to do things never before done by that officer; but in all that was done to carry on that terrible struggle neither the President nor any member of his Cabinet ever felt at liberty to borrow a dollar or incur an obligation without specific and unquestioned authority granted for the particular act. Much as the Treasury Department was criticised in respect to its contraction policy immediately following the war, the people understood that the law authorized the destructive process.

The promise to redeem the greenbacks with coin was authorized by the act of March 18, 1869. The refunding of the public debt was authorized and provided for by the law approved July 14, 1870. Resumption of specie payments was provided for in the act of January 14, 1875.

No act of Congress authorizing the sale of bonds of the United States for any purpose has been passed since 1870, except a supplementary act passed in 1871, adding $300,000,000 to the amount authorized in the law of 1870, and excepting the act of 1875—the resumption act.

Every law relating to the finances enacted during the war and during a period of ten years afterwards was intended to be applied and was applied to a particular purpose specified in the law. Bonds that were sold under the provisions of the act of July 14, 1870, whether for refunding purposes under that act or for resumption purposes under the act of January 14, 1875, were sold at par for coin. There was some criticism of the method of disposing of the bonds, but the letter of the law was followed in every case, with only one probable exception, and the bonds that were exchanged or sold netted par, minus about one-half of 1 per cent commission to the agents who negotiated the sales.

Twenty-four years after the passage of the refunding act, and nineteen years after the approval of the resumption act, the Secretary of the Treasury, in the face of a refusal by Congress to authorize the sale, proceeded to dispose of $50,000,000 worth of ten-year 5 per cent bonds. Senators denounced the proceeding as unlawful. The people were surprised. All of us were mortified. Within a year afterwards a hundred million more were sold without any additional authority of Congress, and it was commonly believed, and never denied, that the proceeds of the sale of the last $62,315,400 netted from eight to ten million dollars profit to the purchasing syndicate, and the Government lost all that the syndicate gained.

The contract was entered into privately. The country knew nothing of its existence except through guesses and sensational charges of the newspapers until after it had been signed and executed by the Secretary of the Treasury of the first part and a few stock brokers of the city of New York of the second part. The country was startled. The people were amazed and bewildered. The Administration was dishonored. The nation was scandalized.

That some person or persons profited by this transaction through dishonorable conduct everybody believes and nobody denies. That the amount of such profits is inconceivably large is as humiliating as it is scandalous and true.

And now we have just passed through another sale, this time $100,000,000 of thirty-year 4 per cent bonds, and this, too, when Congress had refused to grant authority for the sale. It is alleged, and quite generally believed, that this sale would have been made to the same syndicate that purchased the last preceding lot had it not been that popular indignation was manifest in every quarter of the land. As it was conducted, the press and curious persons have asked why certain bidders came in at the last moment, and why one of them altered his bid within a few minutes of the hour for opening the bids.

There has been so much ground for scandal about these bond transactions, there has been so much money taken from the people who will be charged with the debt and taken by persons not entitled to it or to any part of it, and this, too, when the officers' authority is questioned, that the people want to know all about it. And it is to procure that information for them that I have offered this resolution.

A committee of honest, clear-headed men who will search for the truth would have the confidence of the masses to begin with. They would have too much self-respect to stop short of complete work and too much patriotism to needlessly bring reproach on any of their countrymen.

That somebody has gone wrong we all believe; who it is we all wish to know.

Now, it will be observed that in the resolution there are six different lines of thought, suggestive of so many lines of investigation. The first one is that the bond sales in themselves have been unlawful, that the whole proceeding was without authority of law. I do not care to argue the matter, but simply to call attention to it.

Immediately after the first proposition to sell bonds was made in 1894 I called attention to the matter in the Senate and denounced the proceeding as unlawful. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] a few days afterwards followed in the same vein. A resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of this body, and a similar resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives asking the committees to inquire into the legality of the bond selling. No report was ever made in either case, so far as I know.

The people quite generally have been led to believe from what they have heard from speakers upon platforms and writers in the public press that the authority was at least questionable, the ground was debatable. That is one important matter to be investigated in this proceeding.

In the next place, it is alleged and believed by thousands and millions of people in this country, by members of the House of Representatives and by members of this body, that there was coin enough in the Treasury at the time the sales were made to pay off every obligation of the Government due at that time—every one. I tried somewhat extendedly a few weeks ago to prove that matter conclusively before the Senate and the country, citing the figures of the Treasury Department as they have been published from year to year.

In connection with that it was understood by the people at the incipiency of the present Administration that the Secretary of the Treasury understood it to be his duty to pay out coin when coin was asked for; when the contract required coin that coin was to be paid, and that the word "coin" included silver coin as well as gold coin. When his attention was called to the matter by some one interested, he answered that there was no trouble with the Treasury, that there was an abundance of coin to pay all demands upon it, and when upon further suggestion by his inquirer that there was an abundance of silver there he said the Treasury could pay out silver if need be.

That dispatch was published in the evening papers all over the country. The next morning another tune was sung, if I may use that term without irreverence or impropriety. By authority of the President of the United States an Associated Press dispatch stated to the people of the country that so long as this Administration is in power gold will be paid on all the coin obligations of the Government.

That was when the trouble began. The same thousands and millions of people who believe that there was an abundance of coin in the Treasury at the time, as I say, also believe that if the Secretary had paid silver as well as gold all this trouble would have been avoided, and $362,410,350, if I have the figures exactly right, would have been saved in the matter of indebtedness, and all of these scandalous proceedings would have been avoided. That is the second point.

Another point is the unusual method of disposing of the bonds. Heretofore, so far as I know, and so far as the discussion in the Senate a few weeks ago showed, with one single exception possibly, every bond sale before these was made in pursuance of law by public advertisement of thirty days. In these cases the idea of a popular loan has been almost wholly set aside. Certainly as to the second and the third and the beginning of the fourth bond sale no thought of the Department was directed toward a popular loan. I remember very well when the Secretary of the Treasury in the beginning of the first sale spoke about a popular loan, and I felt as if there were anything in the world that would condone for the proceeding it would be that the people at large everywhere should be asked and invited to take part in the bond proceeding.

After the sale was made and it was discovered that the popular-loan feature had been entirely discarded I offered a resolution in the Senate asking for a statement of the names of the persons who purchased the bonds, where they lived, what their business was, the amount of their purchases, etc.; and I remember how promptly the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] rose from his seat and denounced my resolution as impertinent, as if I were trying to pry into the private business of patriotic citizens who were ready with their money to come to the rescue of an imperiled Government. I said to the Senator then that I was amazed and astounded that an American Senator should feel called upon to utter the proposition that the people of the Republic had no right to know who were trafficking in their credit.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me?

Mr. PEFFER. In a moment. Why, I ask, have not the people been invited—Peter and Paul and Silas and Barnabas and all the rest of us with $25, $50, or $100—to take part in this great gold feast? What does the Senator from New York wish to ask?

Mr. HILL. It will hardly be necessary to pass the pending resolution for the purpose of soliciting that information, as the Senate has already passed a resolution——

Mr. PEFFER. I understand to what the Senator from New York refers.

Mr. HILL. As the Senate has already passed a resolution asking the Secretary of the Treasury for the names and residences of the bidders and the amounts of the bids I assume that the only reason why the resolution has not been answered sooner is because several of the bidders have not fulfilled their bids, and undoubtedly the Secretary is waiting to see who will take the bonds, so that he can return a complete list to the Senate.

Mr. PEFFER. I understand very well the object of the Senator's resolution. I thought it was a very proper one, and if I had not been intensely engaged at the time I should have gone over to the other side of the Chamber and congratulated him most heartily, as I did two years ago when he came to my rescue and followed in my lead. Two years before I had asked for similar information, and although my venerable friend, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], opposed it bitterly, we got the information asked for. I am glad to see that the Senator from New York is following so worthy a lead.

The point I make in respect to this matter, I will say to the Senator from New York, is that the methods of effecting sales have been unusual and I simply referred to the part I had taken for the purpose of emphasizing the unusual character of the proceedings.

Then it is charged that there has been favoritism to bidders. I have not made that charge, and here in this presence I wish to disclaim the intention of either charging or asserting that the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Treasury has had any personal connection, of his own knowledge, with any unclean action in these proceedings. I have frequently said and do now repeat that I believe both of those men as men are thoroughly honest, thoroughly patriotic, and sincere. I do believe, in connection with that, however, that both of them, great as they are, have been overreached by bold, bad, shrewd speculators who prey upon the substance of the people. I think that in that one kernel lies all the meat that there will be found in this great transaction, whatever may come out of this resolution; that all that there has been wrong, all that there has been crooked, if I may use that expression, has come through the speculating habits that our people have grown into within the last few years.

Whether there was favoritism or not, it is evident to the country and to the world and to all of us that one class of men in all these cases have succeeded in getting the lion's share of all of the bonds and in taking the lion's share of all the profits, and especially in the third transaction, when the profits must have been between eight and ten million dollars to the syndicate that engineered the scheme through.

Then it is charged finally that there have been fraud and collusion. I have said all that I care to say upon that point.

Now, Mr. President, about the committee. The country's suspicions have been aroused by these proceedings. If with gloved hands and oily tongues we merely refer the resolution to the Finance Committee, where it may or may not meet the death of most of my resolutions which have been referred to that committee, the people of the country will wonder why the Senators have not been willing to face so plain, so clear, so appropriate and judicious a resolution as this one. Doubtless the Vice-President in the selection of the members of the committee will be pleased to have suggestions from both sides and the center of the Chamber. Let us have two faithful, honest, clear-headed men from the other side, two of the same character from this side, and one from the center. The people of the country would have confidence in those five men, the three great political parties being represented by them. The people would understand that the investigation is to be thorough, it is to be honest, it is to be clean; that the members of the committee would not have the smell of fraud upon their garments; that when they would conclude they would present to the people of the country and the world a clean, unvarnished, completed investigation, exposing all that there is to be exposed, going into the dark places that other persons concerned have gone into.

It is for that reason, Mr. President, that I have insisted upon a special committee. Whether the expense will be very large or whether it will be very small is a matter about which I care nothing. The money will be well expended. If the Senate sees proper to authorize the committee, the Senate will see fit properly to clothe it with authority and the necessary machinery for carrying out its work.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I am opposed to the reference of the resolution. I think the matter should have been investigated long ago. United States 4 per cent thirty-year bonds have always had a high market value. About seven years ago, when they had eighteen years to run, they sold at about 25 per cent premium. Some of them when they had nineteen years to run sold, I believe, as high as 27 per cent premium.

That premium has gradually decreased as the time passed on. Last year, a year ago this month, if I recollect aright, they were at about 11 or 12 per cent premium. When the bonds that fall due in 1907, having eleven years to run, had twelve years to run they sold at about 12 per cent premium. Now they have eleven years to run, and they are at about 10 per cent premium. So a bond with thirty years to run, reasoning from all the sales of such bonds that have taken place in the public markets, ought to sell for over 25 per cent premium; yes, 30 per cent premium, if they sold as bonds have averaged from the time of their issue until now. A bond with eleven years to run carries 10 per cent premium, or 11 per cent even, and certainly the others, having nineteen years longer to run, on any fair calculation should sell as high as 25 per cent premium.

The usual mode of soliciting loans by all Governments is to fix a price and then allow the public to bid. In the great Paris loan the price, I think, was fixed at par, and then the public were allowed to bid, and they were allowed to have a pro rata share of the amount they bid for. Nobody who put in a bona fide bid was cut out altogether. Now, when our Administration desired to borrow money and sell the fours, if it had fixed a price corresponding with the average price for which such bonds have sold ever since they were issued, or at least for which they have sold for the last fifteen years, and the public at large had been invited to bid in the usual way, and they had been notified that each bona fide subscriber should have his pro rata, does anybody doubt that the fours that were sold a year ago for 4½ per cent premium would have sold readily for 20 per cent premium? These same bonds which were then put out in less than three months, or within a few months after the transaction, rose to $1.23 or $1.24. The Administration had those facts before them and they wanted to make a new loan. If they had fixed the price so that it would have produced exactly 3 per cent, which would have been between 19 and 20, about 19½ for the last sale of bonds, does anybody doubt they would have all been taken?

I say the radical change from the usual method has excited suspicion and demands an investigation, and the fact is that these transactions have taken place and have been freely criticised by the public while the committees of both Houses have been silent. The Finance Committee of the Senate that had this matter in charge has been silent. The last session passed away and more than two months of this session have already passed without any attention being called to these unusual transactions. It seems to me the country would be better satisfied with a special committee. As the Senator from Kansas has inaugurated it, I do not think it ought to be taken out of his hands. I think he ought to be on that committee and chairman of the committee, as he has had the courage and the patriotism to call for an investigation of the method of disposing of United States bonds, which the public know is a sacrifice of the interests of the people. Everybody knows that if these bonds had been sold in the usual way they would have brought very much more money upon any basis whatever. The idea that thirty-year bonds or twenty-nine-year bonds should sell substantially at the same price as bonds that run only eleven years is absurd.

I have simply called attention to the great loss which the people have suffered by reason of these unusual methods, and an investigation will bring to the attention of the country the ill-advised methods employed. Though no one be implicated in any improper transaction, it will pave the way for better methods in the future and a return to the usual methods by which loans are placed.

I shall not occupy the attention of the Senate to repeat what I have often said, that the issue and sale of these bonds had no authority of law. There was no necessity for it and the sale is cruel at this time, because it is impounding the money of the country and making times worse. I shall not allude to these matters; I am only alluding to the great loss the country has suffered by what has been done and the absolute necessity for an investigation.

Mr. LODGE. In view of the circumstances in regard to these bonds, as well as the charges that have been made and the fact that they involve the credit of the United States, it has seemed to me for a long time that an investigation into them ought to be made. I have no desire to delay the resolution or make any argument about it. I think the Finance Committee is the proper committee to make this inquiry and investigation. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the first three lines and inserting the words "the Committee on Finance be directed to."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "Resolved," strike out lines 1, 2, and 3 of the resolution and insert:

That the Committee on Finance be directed.

Mr. GRAY. What are the words proposed to be stricken out? I ask the Secretary to read them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the words proposed to be stricken out.

The Secretary read as follows:

That a committee of five Senators shall be appointed by the Vice-President, whose duty it shall be.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I am opposed, from the present information which I have, to any investigation whatever on this subject, either by the Finance Committee or a special committee. I do not agree to the proposition that every time there is an idle rumor in the newspapers about some irregularity alleged, some statement that the precise right conduct has not been had, or some vague and indefinite charge that the right course has not been pursued, without any proof, without any substantial charge by some responsible people, the Senate should make haste to empower either a special committee or even a standing committee of this body to investigate the subject.

It has been said here that the people are curious and they ought to know all about it. Are we to institute investigations to satisfy the curiosity of people? Is that worthy of this great body of Senators? Have we not had enough experience in proceedings heretofore had, when, at the instance of the same persons who are now asking for this investigation in part, the Senate has proceeded to dignify matters that were to a large extent unimportant by a serious investigation?

Mr. President, has any Senator risen in his place and charged any distinct irregularity here? Has not the very Senator who proposed this extraordinary resolution disclaimed any intention to reflect either upon the President of the United States——

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HILL. Or upon the Secretary.

Mr. STEWART. I make the charge now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. STEWART. I charge that it was irregular.

Mr. HILL. The Senator will charge anything.

Mr. STEWART. No; but let me make the charge.

Mr. HILL. I will not yield to the Senator to make the charge

now. It comes rather late. I was speaking of the author of this resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York declines to yield.

Mr. STEWART. Do not be afraid. There will be charges enough.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Kansas, who is the author of this resolution, or the joint author, specified nothing in particular that needed investigation. Look at this resolution. Among the things that the committee is to investigate is by what authority these bonds have been issued. Do grave Senators want to appoint a committee to investigate this legal question? Has not this question been discussed over and over again in the Senate? Has not this very statute authority been pointed out over and over again? Was not the Secretary of the Treasury heard at the last session before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House or the Judiciary Committee, I do not recall which, when he was asked his authority? He gave it. It has been stated in the messages of the President; it has been reiterated in the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury; and yet as a part and parcel of this resolution we are now at this day to inquire why and by what authority these bonds are issued.

Of course Senators may rise in their place and say that they doubt the authority. Are not the courts open? Can not Senators go to the courts? Can not there be found some remedy to restrain a public official who insists upon the issuing of bonds contrary to law? What are your courts for? Are we to follow every idle assertion here when Senators rise in their place and doubt the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue these bonds?

Mr. STEWART. Is it an idle assertion to state——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. STEWART. The Senator will allow me——

Mr. HILL. I am so anxious to complete my remarks before 2 o'clock——

Mr. STEWART. Ah, yes.

Mr. HILL. That I can not yield to any interruption on the part of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HILL. I repeat, my anxiety to complete my remarks is so great that I can not even yield to my friend from South Carolina, and I would yield to him as quickly as to any Senator in the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. It was in regard to 2 o'clock that I wanted to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. HILL. I can not be interrupted in regard to 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York declines to yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. The other day we saw the Senator from New York trip up a resolution to which he was opposed by similar sharp practice. That is the point I want to ask him about.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York declines to be interrupted.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I will be the judge of how long I shall speak and when I shall speak.

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, of course.

Mr. HILL. And I will not govern my conduct by the Senator from South Carolina. I was proceeding to say, when I was interrupted by the impulsive Senator from Nevada, that it is proposed by the resolution to investigate by what authority these bonds were issued. Then look at the ridiculousness of the resolution. When we come to analyze it, the Senate is to determine by a committee from what persons or classes of persons the gold was procured with which to buy bonds. You are to take these bidders and bring them before the committee and ask them, "Where did you get your gold?" Possibly he may have to borrow. It is an inquiry into private affairs as to where a man gets his gold with which he invests in the bonds of the Government. Is there no limit to which an inquiry into private affairs shall go?

I said a moment ago that I thought the Senate had had some experience in this matter. What is the use of the Senate dignifying these criticisms by proceeding to have a formal committee to pass upon them? Senators rose in their places in 1894 and called attention to some newspaper articles to the effect that the Senate was indulging in the purchase of sugar stock. You would think from reading the newspapers of the country that all we were doing here that summer was speculating in sugar stock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock——

Mr. HILL. I am very sorry to stop right here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator from New York will be allowed to conclude his remarks.

Mr. HILL. I think the resolution had better go to the Calendar to-day.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the Senator said he was sorry to stop.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution relative to the war in Cuba.

Mr. TELLER. I ask that that may be informally laid aside so that we may continue the consideration of the Military Academy appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4043) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. PEFFER. With the consent of the Senator from Colorado, if I am not out of order, I ask unanimous consent that the bill which has just been laid before the Senate may be temporarily laid aside in order that we may proceed with the consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the business which has been laid before the Senate be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the resolution that was pending at the time the unfinished business was laid before the Senate.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, my conception of my duty requires me to object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York objects.

Mr. PEFFER. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. CALL. Oh, Mr. President, I hope not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution which was under consideration before 2 o'clock.

Mr. TELLER. I hope the Senator from Kansas will not make that motion now. Let us get through with the pending appropriation bill. I trust the Senator will not insist upon the motion.

Mr. PEFFER. I would be willing to withdraw the motion if the bond resolution may be permitted to go over and retain its place, so that we can take it up again to-morrow morning during the morning hour.

Mr. HILL. The bond resolution is not different from any other business in the class of resolutions. It must take its place with the others in the usual course.

Mr. PEFFER. I should like to have it disposed of, and if Senators are ready to vote upon it it can be disposed of in five minutes.

Mr. HILL. It has gone to the Calendar. That settles it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. TELLER. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that we can probably take it up just as well to-morrow, and perhaps better, if he will withdraw his motion.

Mr. PEFFER. I will withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas withdraws his motion.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4043) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, the pending question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. VILAS.

Mr. CHANDLER. The exciting business of the morning being over, it is now in order for all Senators to retire from this body while an appropriation bill is being considered, except some half dozen members of the Appropriation Committee, one of whom, being in the chair, will, of course, remain there, and the ex-Secretaries of War, and the other military gentlemen, constituting some fifteen or twenty Senators, who took part yesterday in the consideration of this bill, included among whom I recognize the eloquent and energetic Senator from Wisconsin, who proposed the pending amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Have we your permission to retire?

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Missouri has certainly my permission to retire.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am very much obliged.

Mr. CHANDLER. I always like to see the Senator here when he is in his present genial frame of mind, but knowing that his omniverous intellect takes charge of and investigates every subject which, by any possibility, can come before the Senate, if he wishes to pursue his inquiries in the silence of his room, I certainly do not now object to his doing so.

Mr. President, I am inclined to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. It occurred to me yesterday that perhaps it would have been better if it had been reported formally from a committee and embodied in a separate bill. In connection with such a bill I should certainly move to include the enlargement of the number of cadets at the Naval Academy. I do not believe, I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin and to the ex-Secretaries of War now upon the floor participating in this discussion, that to include——

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CHANDLER. I always yield.

Mr. ELKINS. I should like to have the pending amendment read. Let us know what we are talking about.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield for the purpose of having the amendment read?

Mr. CHANDLER. No one knows better than the Senator from West Virginia what the amendment is; but of course I will yield if he desires to have it read again at this point in my remarks.

Mr. ELKINS. Let the pending amendment be read from the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the pending amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill insert as an additional section:

SEC. —. That the corps of cadets shall consist of 2 from each State at large, 1 from each Congressional district, 1 from each Territory, 1 from the District of Columbia, and 10 from the United States at large. They shall be appointed by the President, and those appointed at large may be residents of any State in the Union. The two appointed at large from each State shall be actual residents of the State from which they are appointed, and the others shall be actual residents of the Congressional or Territorial districts or the District of Columbia, respectively, from which they purport to be appointed. Any graduates unassigned to existing vacancies within one year after their graduation shall be honorably discharged from the service: Provided, That of the two cadets from each State at large one shall be appointed on the recommendation of each Senator from such State, and that the one from each Congressional district and Territory shall be appointed on the recommendation of the Representative in Congress from such district or the Delegate from such Territory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire will proceed.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I am anxious to educe from the Senator from Wisconsin and the other Senators favoring this amendment exactly what is proposed. Is it proposed that we shall adopt as a deliberate policy the education at West Point of a large number of cadets—a considerable number of cadets, in any event—to be sent out at the end of their courses into civil life, there to remain until called for in some exigency in which the country may find itself? Is that the object? If it be the object, then I was, when interrupted by the Senator from West Virginia, about to say it will be necessary to adopt the same course with reference to the cadets at the Naval Academy; so that if 90 additional cadets are to be educated at West Point, 90 additional cadets will be educated at the NavalAcademy. There is quite as much necessity, the country will say, to have distributed throughout the body of the people, ready for any emergency that may arise, young men educated at the Naval Academy as it will be to thus distribute in civil life young men educated at the Military Academy. The two propositions will have to go along pari passu—the one set to go into civil life from the Naval Academy if the other set goes into civil life from the Military Academy.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire, while he is on that point, to the alleged fact—he would know whether it is a fact perhaps better than anyone else in the Senate—that at least one-half of the class that graduates each year at Annapolis is turned out into civil life, there being no places for them in the Navy, so that the condition of things in regard to the Academy at West Point, if this amendment should pass, would be about what it is now at the Naval Academy, if I am correct in that supposition.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think the Senator from Delaware is mistaken. He has given close attention to this subject, but he has not taken note of the fact that of late, since the new system has been adopted, the graduating classes at the Naval Academy have been reduced, and there has not been sent into civil life any considerable number of Naval Academy cadets at the close of the six years' course. When the law was first adopted assimilating the Naval Academy to the Military Academy at West Point that was the result as to one or two classes, but it was not the result as to the last class, and it will not be the result, I predict, as to future classes unless there is an addition to the number of cadets.

Mr. President, I repeat for the benefit of the Senator from Wisconsin, that if educating young men to send them into civil life is the object and purpose, or if it is a contemplated result of his amendment, the two results must necessarily follow, for it is quite as important to educate surplus graduates at the Naval Academy as it is to educate surplus graduates at the Military Academy.

As I understand the present situation (and inasmuch as the Senator from Delaware called my attention to this point, I ask his attention now), it is that practically all the graduates of West Point enter the military service. There are not discharged into civil life, and have not been for years, any considerable number of West Point cadets. There is the supernumerary list. Temporary commissions are issued, and in the course of a year or two the supernumerary graduates, if there are any, are absorbed into the body of the Army. The Senator from Wisconsin will correct me if I am mistaken in that respect.

Mr. VILAS. I suppose the Senator from New Hampshire refers to the law which now requires the appointment of graduates as additional second lieutenants whether there be a vacancy or not.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do refer to that provision, and I believe (I want the Senator to correct me if I am wrong about it) that sooner or later they are required for the purposes of the Army, and that practically no surplus graduates are against their will discharged into civil life under the operation of the present law.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if there is not a measure reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, or pending there, to allow the competitive examination of a certain number of graduates of other institutions than the Naval Academy for commissions in the Navy.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is now pending, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, a proposition to allow a limited number of graduates in steam engineering from the private institutions of the country to come into the Navy.

Mr. HOAR. So that they shall have an opportunity to compete for commissions?

Mr. CHANDLER. Such a proposition is pending in the Committee on Naval Affairs, but it has not yet been adopted. Let me state the practical situation in reference to the Navy. In 1882 a great increase in the number of naval officers was taking place. There being about 1,500 naval officers and about 2,500 officers of the Army, the casualties requiring new appointments in the Army were more than the casualties in the Navy requiring new appointments, and therefore the Navy was filling up, was increasing the number of its officers faster than the Army was increasing the number of its officers. So there was adopted in 1882, thirteen years ago, the provision that no more appointments should be made from the graduates of the Naval Academy than would be sufficient to fill vacancies in the Navy. More than that, there was provision made for the gradual reduction of both the line and staff corps of the Navy, and that all cadets not required to fill the vacancies while the reduction was going on and afterwards should be discharged into civil life.

The result was that for two or three years there was a surplus of naval cadets, and they were given their honorable graduation certificates, with one year's pay for each, and were discharged into civil life. After a little time, the reductions required by the act of 1882 having taken place, it came to be seen that the classes themselves in the Naval Academy were being gradually reduced during the six years' course. Of late years the net result of the whole proceeding has been that the graduating class at the end of a six years' course is just about sufficient to fill the vacancies in the Navy. The cadets come to know what the number of vacancies will be, the instructors know what the number of vacancies will be, and somehow or other, in accordance with the fitness of things, when a class graduates finally at the end of the six years, it finds waiting for it just enough places, either in the line or the Marine Corps or the Engineer Corps, to require all the graduates.

Mr. President, at the last graduation in June, 1895, there were only three final graduates who did not get commissions. They were graduates who had been prepared especially to enter the line of the Navy. There were surplus vacancies in the Engineer Corps; and there is to-day a bill pending before Congress, which will doubtless be passed, to allow these three surplus graduates of the Naval Academy destined for the line to enter into three vacancies in the Engineer Corps.

If I have made myself understood as to the present situation, it is that under the existing system all the graduates of the Military Academy get into the military service and all the graduates of the Naval Academy get into the naval service.

In addition to graduating a sufficient number of young men to fill the vacancies in the Army and to fill the vacancies in the Navy, I ask, if the supplemental amendment or proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin shall pass Congress whether it is the intention also to educate at the Military Academy and at the Naval Academy a considerable number of young men in each year and send them out into civil life in order that they may give the benefit of their education to the community when no war exists, and in order that they may be drawn from civil life in case a sudden increase of the Army and the Navy should make their services desirable? Is that the object? If it is, then I say that it should be thoroughly and distinctly understood. There should be a sufficient enlargement of the Academy so that when twenty or thirty surplus graduates are found they shall go into civil life in considerable numbers.

I call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the misfortune which happens when only two or three graduates of either Academy shall go into civil life. There seems to be a stigma upon them. I know that at first when this plan was adopted in reference to the Naval Academy, twenty-five or thirty cadets went out into civil life, and there was no such stigma implied, but to-day, when the case is that two or three cadets are threatened with the deprivation of commissions in the Navy which their comrades receive, they feel that they are degraded. Although they pass their examinations they are the lowest on the list, and they are sent out into civil life, not entitled to commissions in the Navy. Unless we increase the number of young men to be educated at the Military Academy, largely increase it, and unless we increase the number of young men to be educated at the Naval Academy, largely increase it, so that the policy shall be a fixed policy of sending at least twenty or twenty-five young men from each Academy out into civil life, the experiment had better not be undertaken.

If the effect, in other words, of the amendment that is proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin, and which is now advocated by Senators upon this floor, is going to be to graduate ten or fifteen young men every year—that will be the number if the Senator from Wisconsin is right about it; and the Senator from Iowa will take notice that if you divide 90 by 4 it will be about 23 and not 90; the first class that comes in will remain four years, the Senator will see, and there will be no appointment during the four years; but in the process of time, through vacancies happening in one way and another, the times when these appointments shall be made will become so distributed that the net result (the Senator from Wisconsin will correct me if I am wrong) will be that there will come to be eventually a graduation every year of one-fourth of 90——

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. Under the amendment there will be 90 appointed this year, for example, and under the amendment there will be 90 appointed next year.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator is wrong about that.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to be corrected.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is where the Senator makes his mistake. Ninety more may go there, but that is all until vacancies happen. If 90 go, one for each Senator, no other appointment can be made until there is a vacancy. The Senator will see that.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that.

Mr. CHANDLER. So if 90 go for four years, of course there will be 90 graduates for four years.

Mr. ALLISON. And no appointments in the meantime?

Mr. CHANDLER. And no appointments in the meantime. But I am explaining to the Senator that that will not be the result at the end of the first year. Three or four will drop out at the end of the second year, and then the new appointments will be made. The result will be that within two or three years this bunch of 90 will be broken up and the net result after half a dozen years will be that we shall have added to the graduates of the Academy less than 20 and probably not over 15 in each year.

Mr. PROCTOR. Twenty-five per cent from the 22.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Vermont is undoubtedly right.

Mr. ALLISON. I misapprehended yesterday. I supposed from the amendment that one would be appointed each year.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator was right in saying that if the 90 remained there would be 90 appointed this year, and they would stay four years, and then we should have 90 new officers.

Mr. ALLISON. Ninety new officers at the end of four years minus the number that had dropped out in the meantime; but they would come in later.

Mr. CHANDLER. They would come in if there were any considerable danger, I would say to the Senator, that this body would not be broken up of itself. It would be advisable to break it up by legislation by providing that there should be so many appointments this year, so many next, and so many next, but I am entirely certain that the corps of 90 first introduced into the Academy would break up of itself with sufficient rapidity.

Mr. VILAS. If the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me, he has very lucidly and plainly explained the result, which is in correspondence with the present rule to require the appointments that might have been made, or perhaps might yet be under a contingency made, all in a single year; but there wants to be added, to understand the full effect of the breaking-up process which he has explained, that when any vacancy occurs by the failure of an appointee to pass an examination the new appointee usually goes in at the beginning of the succeeding year; he is not received in the course of the year, and that contributes still more to the distribution of the right of appointment.

Mr. CHANDLER. So I say, Mr. President, in aid of the Senator from Wisconsin, if this method is to be adopted, there is no great harm in making the appointments at the present time. The number of graduates at the Naval Academy each year, as Senators will see, would be even less, because there you divide 90 by 6, it being a six-year course, and that, if my arithmetic is right, would be 15 each year, if they all graduated, and in practice it would be found that it probably would not add over 10 graduating cadets to the present classes.

Mr. President, I recur to my original idea. I say, if this is to be done, it ought to be established as a policy that you are to send a considerable number of these cadets into civil life every year, and that it is not done as an indirect method of enlarging either the Army or the Navy. If we wish to enlarge the Army, and if we are to create additional cadets for the purpose of enlarging the Army, that is one thing, but we want to steer clear of enlarging the Army in order to take care of a certain number of cadets who, having been educated at the Military Academy, want to get into the Army like their fellow-graduates. I say it is necessary to steer clear of this danger. If it is not the intention of the Senator who proposes the amendment, and not the intention of Senators who advocate it, then the true policy ought to be declared; and after it is adopted, when there are half a dozen graduates of the Military Academy for whom there are no places, or when there are half a dozen graduates of the Naval Academy for whom there are no places, we ought not to be worried in Congress with propositions for special legislation setting out that these young men went into these Academies expecting to get into the military or naval service, but they find themselves, two or three or a half dozen of them, humiliated by the fact that there are no places for them in the Army or Navy, and Congress is appealed to to make new offices in both the military and the naval service in order to protect them.

I ask if it is the deliberate opinion of the Senator who advocates this policy that there should be sent out into private life a considerable number of these graduates every year? There are two opinions on that subject. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] yesterday certainly advised that such a course should be pursued. I think he advocated the education for civil life every year at the Military Academy of a body of these young men. On the other hand, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL], who I now see in his seat, and who has had experience and is a close observer on this subject, mentioned, if I am not mistaken, one of the classes in the Naval Academy from which a considerable number of cadets were discharged into private life, and said he understood that the education of those young men at the Naval Academy did not fit them for civil pursuits, and that they were not successful in private life.

Mr. President, that may not be because the education at the Naval Academy was not calculated to fit them for civil life. It may be that the reason they did not succeed was because instead of going promptly into civil life, recognizing that as their fate, recognizing that as the policy of the Government, they continued to wait and wait and wait, with special bills, such as I have alluded to, pending in Congress to give them commissions in the Navy, until they had ruined three or four or a half dozen of the best years of their lives seeking to avoid a civil career and to get back into a position where they could enter upon a military career. That may be the explanation of the result which came to the attention of the Senator from New Jersey. I do not know whether that is a fact or not.

Having called attention to these obvious difficulties in the way of the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin, having insisted that the same course ought to be pursued for the Naval Academy which is pursued for the Military Academy, and contending, as I do, that if this new departure is to be taken a large number of cadets should be introduced into the Military Academy and the Naval Academy, so that the surplus graduates may be considerable in number each year, it is right that I should state my own opinion on the subject.

I am inclined to think that it would be wise to do this. I am inclined to think that it is good policy to enlarge the number of cadets at both Academies, to use liberally for the education of the youth of this country the facilities which are afforded by those schools, and to send out into civil life at the close of each year, say twenty or twenty-five graduates of the Military Academy and twenty or twenty-five graduates of the Naval Academy, but I insist that this change must be made in pursuance of a deliberate policy which will send these young men out into civil life the moment they find they can not get commissions in the Army or the Navy, and will keep them away from the halls of Congress, so that they will not be here, after we have educated them, according to this policy, claiming, as they have done in so many instances, that because we educated them at these military institutions, paying them $500 a year to go there and be educated, therefore we are under an obligation to give them commissions in the Army and the Navy.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I was unfortunate in not being in the Chamber when the Senator from New Hampshire began his remarks, and I beg to inquire of him whether I misunderstand him or not in reference to the effect produced by an education at either of those Academies upon young men as to their fitness in after life for the ordinary vocations of life?

Mr. CHANDLER. I say to the Senator from Georgia now, as I had the honor to say to him in conversation this morning or last evening, that there was a difference of opinion developed between the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from New Jersey on that point, which is one of importance, and one that ought to be settled before we adopt this legislation. The Senator from Wisconsin was of the opinion that it was a good preparation for a civil career to educate young men at West Point. The Senator from New Jersey said that his attention had been called to instances where surplus graduates of the Naval Academy sent into private life had not succeeded in civil life, and that their education at the Naval Academy had been of no benefit to them. My own impression—to answer the Senator as I have already done—is that if this system is one which immediately sends these graduates into private life, so that they do not stay about Congress seeking to get into the Army and the Navy because we have educated them for the Army and the Navy, no harm will be done, and the education which they receive at those two great establishments will be an admirable preparation for the duties of civil life.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, as to the failures of the cadets from either of those academies in private life, I apprehend that, as a general proposition, they would have failed if educated at any other institution. There are failures of lawyers, physicians, educated specifically for those duties in life. Certainly there can be nothing in the curriculum or in the training at those institutions calculated to disqualify young men for any of the avenues of life. The branches they study at West Point are of the most solid character; their habits, by the regulations of the institution, are compelled to be orderly, systematic, and prompt. Every one of the requisitions necessary for success in any avenue of life is cultivated, stimulated, and required by the tuition at those institutions.

Besides, Mr. President, I apprehend, if the question were asked of any Senator upon this floor whether he could point to more failures than successes in other avenues of life by young men who had graduated at those institutions, the answer would be prompt that the successes largely prevailed, for there are more successes than failures of that class of men. That is certainly true as to my experience. I recall one instance just now of a man who rose to the very highest eminence as a lawyer in my own State after graduating at West Point and serving in the Army, who served as our minister abroad only a few years ago, and was for a long time president of the Bar Association of the United States. I might mention others. I only want to insist that, so far as the tuition and regulations and orderly requirements of those institutions are concerned, certainly no man who has examined them will doubt that they are calculated to fit men for any of the vocations of life rather than to destroy their prospect of success.

Mr. SEWELL. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS]. The amendment is in the interest of those who are struggling for commissions in the Army. Anyone who will analyze the two propositions will appreciate the object of the amendment. With this proposed increase, unless there is some provision made for the deserving noncommissioned officer, who is now studying and working hard for a commission, he can not possibly succeed.

I think the amendment I propose to offer will meet with the favor of the Senator from Wisconsin, and in fact with that of all of the Senators who are interested in this change. I myself am in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin on general principles, but I should vote against it unless this provision is made by which the President shall have the power to appoint as an officer one who has passed an examination as a noncommissioned officer in the Army.

I have kept the run of the Army for a great many years, having been a member of the Committee on Military Affairs in my past service in this body. I have taken a pride in the study, and it may be almost said that I have made a hobby of it, so that I know as much of it as anybody else.

There are probably 100 young men to-day, gentlemen of character and education, young fellows who can not get commissions and can not get appointments to West Point, who have enlisted for four years in the Army in order to finally secure commissions; but the vacancies arising do not supply places for one-fourth of the officers' sons who are anxious to follow the profession of their fathers. I know to-day a number of college graduates who have actually gone and taken a musket and are serving in the Army, so that they can be made corporals and sergeants, meantime pursuing their studies, so as to secure commissions directly from the Army. I should deprecate very much indeed any legislation that would say to these young men, whose pluck I admire, "You can not obtain what you wish, because we have barred the doors to you by providing that everybody must go through West Point to get a commission."

I ask to have the amendment read, and I trust the Senator from Wisconsin will accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the pending amendment it is proposed to add:

And provided further, That the President may, in his discretion, appoint to vacancies in the grade of second lieutenant meritorious noncommissioned officers of the Army, when recommended according to the provisions of the act of June 18, 1878, although graduates of the Military Academy may remain in service unassigned.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the amendment to the amendment which has just been offered is in the line of what I have been thinking about while I have listened to this discussion. While our Government in many respects is the freest and best upon the face of the earth, yet if we look at our Army and our military system it is perhaps the most aristocratic and the most exclusive in the world. There is perhaps no country where in time of peace, or, indeed, in time of war, it is more difficult to rise from the ranks to that of a commissioned officer in the regular army than it is in the Army of the United States.

It was my lot to serve during the war of the late rebellion as a private and a noncommissioned officer. I marched and countermarched with my knapsack and musket. I rode in the cavalry and charged and countercharged, guarded the rear and rode in front as corporal and enlisted man, and my sympathy always extends to the men in the ranks.

I have time and again seen examples of the spirit which is manifested by some of the people from West Point. A short time ago an officer was restored to his place in the Army by a bill passed by Congress. He was shot in a camp near Chicago, and they had a court-martial to try the man who shot him. I remember what scant justice the military court administered in that case to a poor fellow who had come over from abroad during the war and had risen in the ranks to be an officer.

His widow came to me when I was the executive of Minnesota to attend the court-martial as a witness. I sent my private secretary over with her to attend the court. I had an inkling that they would hardly accord decent courtesy to her, and so instead of going myself with the lady I sent my private secretary. The treatment that the court-martial accorded her was the scantiest and poorest courtesy that ever a woman could have. They subpœnaed her as a witness and then kept her outside on the pretense that she could not hear the testimony and the proceedings of the trial of the man who had killed her own husband.

That man came over here, as I have said, during the days of the great rebellion. On his own merits and without any friends at court he got a position in the Regular Army. The West Pointers disliked him. They got him court-martialed in New Mexico and had him removed from the Army. He had a faithful wife. He came on here, and twice a bill was passed authorizing the President to restore him. The first time the bill was passed it was sent to the War Department, and the officers there, with the West Point spirit in their midst, advised the President not to sign it. The time being short, President Cleveland had no time to examine the bill, and so when it was first passed he refused to approve it. But he gave the friends of the officer to understand that if he had opportunity he would look into the matter and restore him to the ranks.

At the next session of Congress a similar bill was passed. It, too, was referred to the War Department, and from there it came with an adverse report. President Cleveland himself sat up one of the long summer nights to read the proceedings of the court-martial in New Mexico. After reading it he became convinced that injustice had been done, and he signed the bill and restored the man to the ranks. From that day I have always admired President Cleveland for the great interest he took even in an humble soldier who had been unfairly treated.

Mr. President, I have referred to this incident for the purpose of calling attention to a spirit that is in the Army, more or less. You read every day of desertions from the Army. You read how men get into the Army and how they run away; and you hear of court-martial proceedings every once in awhile. Why is this? It is because the military system has made an impassable gulf between the private and the commissioned officer, and what has aided in that direction is West Point. We have the line there preventing the enlisted man from obtaining high positions in the Army.

I should be in favor of increasing the force of cadets; I am in favor of increasing the number of officers in the Army; but, in heaven's name, let us take those men from the ranks. Let us give the American soldier, the private and the noncommissioned officer, an opportunity to rise in the ranks and become an officer. In that way we can get a better class of privates, as a better set of men will enlist. They know now that there is no hope for them, or, at least, very little; next to nothing. To be sure, a few men can get in, but they know that the chance of coming to the front in the Army is almost hopeless; and hence we get an inferior class of men.

Once throw the doors open so that the private soldier, the educated and intelligent soldier, can rise and become an officer in the Army, and you will have a superior class of men, and instead of half of our Army on the frontier being devoted to court-martialing the other half you will have an army of the best enlisted men on the face of the globe.

During the war of the rebellion our Army, composed of volunteers, especially those who enlisted during the early years of the war before it became necessary to resort to big bounties and to the draft, contained a superior class of men. We all know how many of the men in the ranks were the equals in character and standing and ability of the men who commanded them. We know, too, how those men, with that spirit of patriotism which was so magnificent in the bosom of the American people, coming from the vocations of civil life not only wore the garb of the soldier, but did that which was more humiliating than anything else, yielded the most abject obedience to their superiors; yes, the superiors who at home were their inferiors. It is this spirit which was manifested in the ranks of the common soldiers during the late war that I should like to see given a show to come to the front. It is this element that I should like to see recognized; and for that reason if we could have an increase of 90 cadets once in four years from the ranks of the Army, I should support it with all my heart. But as the amendment is submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] I never can support it. It is making a bad matter worse.

Mr. HAWLEY. Has the Senator from Minnesota noticed the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS]?

Mr. NELSON. I concur in the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey to the amendment, so far as it goes. It is in the right spirit, but it does not go far enough.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator would not have all the officers selected from the Army?

Mr. NELSON. I should formulate the amendment so that the 90 cadets would in one way or another come from the ranks.

Mr. ALLEN obtained the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I merely wish to suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] a verbal amendment, which perhaps the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] will allow me to do, now that I am up.

Where the amendment says, "residents of any State in the Union," I suggest that he strike out "of any State" and insert "anywhere"; so that it will read, "residents anywhere in the Union." The President, as to his 10 cadets, certainly ought to have the right to take meritorious youths from the Territories or the District of Columbia as well as from a State.

Mr. VILAS. The language of the amendment as originally proposed was copied from the Revised Statutes.

Mr. HOAR. I understand, but there is an inadvertence in the respect I have mentioned.

Mr. VILAS. I observe the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, and if he will offer the amendment I shall be very glad to accept it.

Mr. HOAR. I move to strike out the words "of any State" and insert "anywhere."

Mr. CULLOM. "In the United States."

Mr. HOAR. The amendment says "in the Union."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 6 of the amendment strike out the words "of any State" and insert "anywhere," so as to read:

They shall be appointed by the President, and those appointed at large may be residents anywhere in the Union.

Mr. VILAS. "Of any part of the Union."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. I rose to ask the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] if he would have any objection to an amendment to his amendment to include private soldiers as well as noncommissioned officers. I suggest the propriety of broadening the amendment, so that it shall include not only noncommissioned officers, but private soldiers.

Mr. SEWELL. I merely adopted what is the rule now. If a young fellow is capable of being made an officer, he will rise to the rank of a noncommissioned officer first. That demonstrates his first capability to be an officer. I do not think we ought to change that system.

Mr. BATE. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. BATE. In regard to the appointment of noncommissioned officers, I stated yesterday, and so believed, that promotion from the Army is confined to the appointment of noncommissioned officers, corporals, and sergeants, on the theory that the commander of a regiment or a company would recommend his best men for those positions, and thus they would gradually get up. I find that in the law it is not so confined. It seems to take in the enlisted men. Allow me to read it. It is to be found in General Orders, No. 79, Headquarters of the Army, November 26, 1892.

Be it enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to prescribe a system of examination of enlisted men of the Army, by such boards as may be established by him, to determine their fitness for promotion to the grade of second lieutenant.

And then it goes on to give the necessary qualifications:

Provided, That all unmarried soldiers under 30 years of age, who are citizens of the United States, are physically sound, who have served honorably not less than two years in the Army, and who have borne a good moral character before and after enlistment, may compete for promotion under any system authorized by this act.

So I think it already includes enlisted men.

Mr. SEWELL. In reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], if that is the rule I have no objection to the substitution of the term "enlisted men" for "noncommissioned officers." That covers both branches.

Mr. ALLEN. Do I understand the Senator from New Jersey to accept my suggestion?

Mr. SEWELL. Yes; to substitute "enlisted men" for "noncommissioned officers."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed modification of the amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out "noncommissioned officers" and insert in lieu thereof the words "enlisted men."

Mr. SEWELL. Let the amendment to the amendment be read as it will read if the change is made.

The SECRETARY. So that if amended the amendment to the amendment will read:

And provided further, That the President may, in his discretion, appoint to vacancies in the grade of second lieutenant meritorious enlisted men of the Army, etc.

Mr. ALLEN. That is not the modification which I suggested. I suggested that after the words "noncommissioned officers" the words "and enlisted men" be inserted.

Mr. CULLOM. This language comprehends the whole thing.

Mr. SEWELL. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that the term "enlisted men" includes noncommissioned officers.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand that point well, but I understand that the statute read by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE], under the regulations of the Department, has been confined to noncommissioned officers, and in order that there may be no mistake about it, to the prejudice of the enlisted man as distinguished from the noncommissioned officer, because there is a distinction——

Mr. HAWLEY. Not always.

Mr. ALLEN. I suggest that the amendment to the amendment be modified so that it will include not only noncommissioned officers, but enlisted men as well.

Mr. SEWELL. I have no objection to it.

Mr. PROCTOR. I think the Senator from Nebraska is mistaken about the matter. Under the recent act the regulations allow every enlisted man to enter the examination. They are examined first with the company and then with the regiment, and those who pass the best examination are brought on finally and recommended for commissions. The opportunity is not confined to noncommissioned officers. It is open to the entire enlisted force of the Army.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont what objection there can be to the amendment as it now exists? Let the Secretary again read the amendment as it now stands.

Mr. PROCTOR. There is not the slightest objection. It is merely unnecessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will again be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

And provided further, That the President may, in his discretion, appoint to vacancies in the grade of second lieutenant meritorious enlisted men of the Army.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand the Senator from New Jersey accepts the suggestion to insert "and enlisted men."

Mr. SEWELL. I have no objection to that suggestion.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have. It is simply using up so much time and paper for nothing. Every noncommissioned man is an enlisted man. It is making a distinction that does not exist.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] has a right to modify his amendment if he desires to do so.

Mr. HAWLEY. I respectfully suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that I would not do it.

Mr. SEWELL. Very well; but I see no objection to it.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think I do. It is making a distinction that does not exist.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not think the Senator from Connecticut is shedding any light upon the world as to the distinction he makes.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is needed while the Senator from Nebraska is talking.

Mr. ALLEN. It may be needed in the Senator's direction. It is not needed in mine, nor is it needed from the source from which it comes. I understand what an enlisted man is and what that term means; I understand it from actual experience, and I do understand that in Army circles (and we who have served in the Army all understand it) a distinction is made between noncommissioned officers and enlisted men as such. Now, there is no use of caviling about it. The distinction does exist and has existed.

The amendment to the amendment, in the language which was first used by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL], supplemented by my suggestion, prevents any distinction of this kind being made in Army circles in the future, and it certainly does not consume so much paper as the proposed amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. VILAS. I think the Senator from Nebraska will recognize on a moment's reflection that the term "enlisted men" comprehends noncommissioned officers, and that the term "privates" is the one used as against noncommissioned officers. If you say "enlisted men" it is the same as if you say "noncommissioned officers and privates." If the Senator prefers the term "noncommissioned men and privates," why not use it?

Mr. ALLEN. I have recognized, of course, the superior information of Senators upon this subject, but I insist that in its technical interpretation, its practical interpretation, in Army circles the term "enlisted men" does not embrace noncommissioned officers.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to say to the Senator from Nebraska that when we use the word "private" it is proper to say "noncommissioned officer and private."

Mr. ALLEN. I understand that point.

Mr. NELSON. But the term "enlisted men" includes both classes in law and in fact, and you can not get any better term than "enlisted men." It includes everything below an officer.

Mr. PROCTOR. I read from the order of General Schofield based upon this law, which shows the method in which it is administered:

Any soldier—

That, I think the Senator from Nebraska will admit, includes noncommissioned officers.

Mr. ALLEN. That includes everything.

Mr. PROCTOR. I will proceed:

Any soldier, otherwise qualified, whose age will not exceed 30 years on the 1st of September following, and who shall have served honorably not less than two years in the Army on or before that date, may (on or before the 1st day of February of any year after 1892) make application, through the regular military channels, to his department commander for preliminary examination, with a view to determine his eligibility for entering the competitive examinations.

That is the method in which the law has been administered.

Mr. ALLEN. I have no objection to having the word "soldier" inserted in lieu of what has been inserted, but I want to repeat, in answer to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], that I understand the term "enlisted men," in its generic sense, includes not only the private soldier, but the noncommissioned officer. I do not think any new light is being shed upon that point.

But I want to assert also in this connection, as the honorable Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] well knows from experience, that in actual Army life we do recognize a distinction between a noncommissioned officer and a private soldier, and now to cover the case of a private soldier I want this language or some equivalent language inserted, so that no discrimination can be made in favor of the noncommissioned officer as against an enlisted man.

Mr. SEWELL. If the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. SEWELL. If the Senator from Nebraska will be satisfied with the insertion of the word "soldier," which covers everything just the same as "enlisted men," I will agree with him in that respect and ask to have the change made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the change suggested by the Senator from New Jersey.

The SECRETARY. The amendment to the amendment, if modified, will read as follows:

And provided further, That the President may, in his discretion, appoint to vacancies in the grade of second lieutenant any meritorious soldier of the Army.

Mr. ALLEN. That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. SEWELL. Now, if the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] will accept the amendment to the amendment, it will simplify the matter.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to make one suggestion to the Senator from New Jersey. The amendment to the amendment as proposed by him refers to the law of 1878. I should like to suggest to him that it would be well to add a reference also to the law of 1892 since this change.

Mr. SEWELL. I accept that suggestion.

Mr. VILAS. Then I will accept the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Before the amendment to the amendment is disposed of, I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey whether, as he has got the amendment to the amendment, it does not authorize the President to fill all vacancies in the grade of second lieutenant with these soldiers, excluding altogether the graduates of West Point, and without any qualification as to age.

Mr. SEWELL. It gives the President the discretion to appoint under the rule.

Mr. HOAR. Then we may have the curious spectacle of a law providing for the education of 300 cadets. Let me ask how many men are there in the House of Representatives now?

Mr. SEWELL. Three hundred and fifty-six.

Mr. VILAS. The possible number of cadets is 371.

Mr. HOAR. There will be 356 cadets, and 90 more, and then the addition that will come when there is a new redistricting, which will increase the number probably thirty or forty in the other House, so that within five or six years we shall have a military school having classes entering at least numbering a third of about 450, and the President of the United States authorized by the same law to exclude every one of those young men from appointment in the Army, and to appoint from the Army at large. We have careful limitations of age in the matter of entry, and it of course affects the graduation of the young men, but there is no limitation whatever in point of age as to these appointees.

Now, of course we could trust a great deal to the discretion of any President of the United States in such a matter, but it is a pretty strange thing to put it in a law.

Mr. SEWELL. The original limitation as to age is in the law now, and it covers that point. It does leave the discretion to the President as to how many he shall appoint.

Mr. HOAR. But the Senator's amendment to the amendment provides that notwithstanding any number of graduates of West Point may remain unassigned the President may fill the vacancies—I give the substance and not the language—in the Regular Army by appointing meritorious soldiers.

Mr. SEWELL. He has that discretion.

Mr. HOAR. Without any limitation.

Mr. SEWELL. There is a limitation in the law.

Mr. HOAR. I have looked at the law, and there is nothing in it that limits it in regard to soldiers.

Mr. SEWELL. The law limits it to soldiers 30 years of age.

Mr. HOAR. They must have served not less than two years.

Mr. SEWELL. And be not over 30 years of age?

Mr. HOAR. It is not in this law. The Senator may find it, but it is not in section 4, which is referred to in the Senator's amendment to the amendment.

This is not a matter with which I am very familiar, but I repeat that it seems to me exceedingly singular to have an extensive military establishment—leave out the limitation as to age—by which an average of 150 soldiers or thereabouts a year are to be educated in the near future, if they all get through, and then provide in the same breath that although all of those men remain unassigned, the President may, in his discretion, appoint and fill up the whole Army list from the soldiers.

Suppose we should have a President who takes the view of the honorable Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who stated his views very earnestly, and there are a great many people in this country, good, sensible people, who have done great patriotic service themselves, who dislike the very idea of a West Pointer. I could call the attention of my honorable friend, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL], to men who served with us in the Senate—famous soldiers themselves—to whom it was like shaking a red rag at a bull to mention West Point. Suppose we had a President of that way of thinking. It seems to me it is rather a strange way to legislate.

Mr. SEWELL. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that we could very soon amend the law if any President should make such a radical change.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps he would not consent to the change of the law.

Mr. SEWELL. Oh, yes, he would. I do not think that even in that case you would do such great injustice as you propose to do now without the amendment to the amendment. I can cite on pretty good authority the cases of eight graduates of Harvard who are serving as privates in a regiment for the purpose of obtaining commissions.

Mr. HOAR. I have no doubt that an occasional private——

Mr. SEWELL. I have no doubt they would make good officers.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I could not distinctly hear the colloquy that has been going on across the Chamber, only that it was concerning the practical operation of this law, and as to what is being done now in regard to the matter of the appointment of men from civil life and also from the Army.

I find by examination that in 1895, 14 enlisted men were presented for what they call "candidates" for commissions. That is about as many as has ever been presented in any one year. Of those, 4 have already been commissioned and are in the Army. Eight of the number are to be nominated to vacancies, and those vacancies already exist, or virtually so, because the names of officers for promotion have been presented, and some of them are now before the Senate. That accounts for 12 of them, leaving only 2 of all those who came from the Army in 1895. Those 2 will be provided for in a month or six weeks, I was informed by the Adjutant-General, for 4 officers are about to retire who have commands in the Army. So there will soon be 4 vacancies, and no West Pointer is to come until June. Hence those 2 will be provided for and complete the list for that year of those who became applicants from the Army. This was the practical operation of one year, and I suppose it to be a fair sample of other years, and furnishes us practical information as to the operation of the law governing these promotions.

Now, what is the mode of doing it? In the first instance, under the regulations, as I understand, there is a board appointed by the Secretary of War, perhaps a departmental board and afterwards a general board, to which they can appeal. These men go before the board for examination. They have, however, to file an application in writing three months before they are permitted to go before that board. The applicant must have been in the Army two years as an enlisted soldier, either as a private soldier or as a noncommissioned officer. They must be unmarried and 21 years old, and not exceeding 27 years of age. It is confined to that limit.

As to the West Pointers, the 30th of June is the annual period, I believe, for their graduation, and their commissions date from that time. They are then assigned to the various commands according to the grade and rank of the cadet in the class. This assignment is controlled by the judgment of the professors of the institution, due consideration being given to his grade or rank in his class. The West Pointers under the existing course of assignment have preference in filling these vacancies. In other words, if there are only so many vacancies to be filled and there are also candidates in waiting from the Army, and some appointed from civil life, the West Pointers have precedence. That is their regulation. Next in precedence are the men who come up from the Army and have undergone this examination—physical as well as a mental examination—which, I believe, is pretty much the same that is observed at West Point. It is a very severe test. Those men who have come up from the Army, after pursuing the course which is prescribed, stand second in precedence for these vacancies.

Then the third class are those who are appointed from civil life, and they are dependent solely upon a vacancy. There are rarely any vacancies under this process during the summer and fall, because this brilliant corps of young men, highly educated and prepared for their official duties, fill up all the vacancies at first. But after that period vacancies gradually come until, as has been shown in this debate, there are perhaps not more than 22 per cent, as the Senator from Connecticut has said, who are left in the class.

That is the mode pursued in getting these various classes of military appointments in the Army, some coming from West Point, some from the Army, and some from civil life. It has, I understand, worked very well. At least it would seem so from the facts I have just given, that out of the 14 who came from the Army last year every one of them now has virtually received appointment.

I care not to make any invidious distinction as to who should take precedence, the cadet, or the man who comes up from the Army or is appointed from civil life. My sympathy would most naturally be with the man who comes from the Army, who works his way up, who studies for two years, and undergoes the examination by the critical and severe board appointed by the Secretary of War. Precedence should always be given to merit, whether found in the cadet or the man from the Army. Let that be as it may, it seems to me that under the present operation no one stays outside of the Army who wants to get there and has the merit to command the place.

Then the question practically presents itself, suppose we increase the number to 90, 1 to each Senator, which makes the 90, what will be the practical effect? I do not know, but I think the amendment to the amendment that was offered by the Senator from Wisconsin is a very good one, a wise and a practical one; that is, if there should be anyone unprovided for after all these vacancies are filled they should be, after one year's time, retired, discharged honorably, and returned to civil life. That, I think, would work well.

A criticism has been made to the effect that men who live in the Army and become used to that kind of life are unfit for the duties of civil life. That may be true in many instances, but I know some instances to the contrary. This criticism will not attach to young men who leave the Army early. After a man remains ten or a dozen years in the Army and gets familiar with its duties and regards it as his life business, looks to it alone and does not care for outside matters, or come in contact with the world, has been confined to his barracks or his camp and wedded to military life, it is not natural to believe that he can be a success in that every day life where he comes in contact with a different class of people and enters a different kind of employment. It seems to me, however, that it will be beneficial to this country to have scattered through it men of finished scientific education, especially in the military, as they can become teachers to our State National Guards and, in the event of war, would be the nucleus around which to form commands.

If these men when young are retired under this amendment, if there is no vacancy for them to fill, if they come along and present themselves and there is no place for them in the Army, then after a year retire them. Their habits have not been perfectly formed, their tastes have not become fixed, and their habits of life are not incorrigible, and they go, as any other young man would from any other college, splendidly equipped with educational advantages for any kind of life that may come to them, whether of a scientific or of an ordinary and practical character.

I say, Mr. President, that is one of the reasons why I favor this proposition. As to the appointment by each Senator I would, as a Senator, gladly be relieved from the embarrassment which I know such things bring on men in our position, but I believe it to be for the good of the country, and when I say so I want to say in connection with it that I am not in favor of increasing the Army in order to give these men places. I am against that, but I think they should be retired to civil life if there is a surplus of them upon the rolls of the Army, and as graduates of West Point let them go into these various avocations well equipped and make themselves distinguished.

Without going into it, I believe that most of the distinguished men who figured in the late war on the Federal side came from civil life after having graduated at West Point, not to say anything of Confederates, because we had fewer men from West Point with us, but we did have some of them, and as great and grand military characters as are known in the history of any country, and equal to any upon the other side or, perhaps, in the world. That is my faith in some of the men from West Point who fought with us Confederates.

But, Mr. President, there are some singular facts that may be mentioned in this connection. I speak not of the Confederate, but Federal side. It is a remarkable fact that on January 1, 1860, there were 1,085 officers in the Army. I have gotten this from Heitman's Historical Register of the Army and from some other sources. I say that on January 1, 1860, there were 1,085 officers in the United States Army. Seventy per cent were graduates of West Point. Of these, 282 resigned, leaving 80 as a nucleus on which to form the vast armies that followed. At this date there were in civil life, approximately, between 175 and 200 ex-officers who had ceased to belong to the Army, most of them having discarded it, but some few of them were discarded by it, because many of them had retired of their own will for the purpose of entering into various avocations and some of those men who were leading officers of the Federal Army in the late war did so.

In this connection comes the remarkable and instructive fact that for twenty-two years after the retirement of General Scott from the head of the United States Army, who retired November 1, 1861, the Army was commanded exclusively from this latter class who had retired from the Army and had assumed duties appertaining to civil life—McClellan for one year, Halleck for two years, Grant for five years, and Sherman for fourteen years. All those men had retired from the Army and had taken civil duties, and then when the war broke out they returned to the Army. They are men who had mixed with the world and had been graduates of West Point and who became, as I said, the nuclei around which the strength of the Army gathered.

Then comes the additional instructive fact that of the 13 distinguished Army and corps commanders, Fremont, Rosecrans, Hooker, Burnside, Meade, Howard, Dix, Hancock, Thomas, Buell, Pope, Slocum, and McDowell, 8 came from the same class and only 5, Hancock, Thomas, Buell, Pope, and McDowell, remained in the Army continuously, and all but 2 of the 13 were graduates. Only those remained in the Army continuously, but the others had left the Army and gone into civil walks of life, and then when the war came they resumed their military careers.

On the 1st of of April, 1863, when war was flagrant, there were 326 general officers of the Army on the Register, and of those but 112 were from the 801 in continuous service, while 45 were from the 175 to 200 ex-officers before referred to, and 169 from the volunteers. In other emergencies may we not expect similar valuable results from those disbanded officers and graduates?

Almost the only explanation I can offer for these remarkable facts is that after five or ten years' service in the Army in time of peace the ambition, grasp, individuality, and self-reliance is dwarfed, where the duties are entirely of a perfunctory character, as compared with the school of the ex-officer who enters the list of civil pursuits on the line of the survival of the fittest.

General Scott was spoken of yesterday by my distinguished friend from Georgia, Senator GORDON, but the Senator was a little in error. Scott, who was at the head of the Army, was not a graduate of West Point, and General Taylor was not a graduate of that institution. General Worth was not a graduate. Percifer F. Smith, of the Mexican war, was not a graduate, and I might go on down the line to the useful and efficient agency that was behind these men. There were such graduates of West Point as Lee, and Grant, and Sherman, and Johnston, Bragg, and others who served in the Mexican war as captains, but the real commanders of the Army in the Mexican war were men who had not graduated at West Point.

So I say I will support the amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, which requires a number of these men to be retired if there are no vacancies after one year; that after being in the Army one year, if there is no place for them, they may go into the private walks of life and make themselves useful as citizens; and then when we have trouble, which I hope we may never have, they will constitute the nuclei around which can gather the strength of this people, for our strength rests in the volunteer corps of this country, and not exclusively in the Regular Army. We have a small Regular Army, but if it was necessary we would have without delay a million of men in the field, sir, inspired by the spirit of patriotism that guides our people under the volunteer system. I think, then, this amendment ought to be passed, for I believe it will inure to the benefit of the country.

Mr. HAWLEY. I glanced hastily over the register of the first 10 regiments of infantry. They average 35 officers to a regiment, making 350 officers. I find that 60 of them, or 17 per cent, were appointed from the Army.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I shall accept, if there be no objection on the part of others, the amendment proposed by the distinguished Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL], being in entire accord with that feeling which has been manifested on the floor of a desire to preserve the spirit of emulation in the ranks of the Army which is to be engendered by the hope of promotion to the line.

I wish to make only a very few observations, but in the beginning I should like to make one or two in correction of a misunderstanding which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] was laboring under yesterday in the remarks which he submitted to the Senate as to the mode in which the power of appointment has been exercised. I know nothing in respect to the appointments to the Naval Academy, and I make no comment upon so much of his observations as related to the Naval Academy, for I am not advised; but he confounded, without discrimination, appointments to the Military Academy and to the Naval Academy, and added:

> The law as it exists has been construed by some person, I do not know by whom, to authorize the President, if there is a failure to recommend within the time specified, to select a cadet from any part of the United States and accredit him to any Congressional district whose quota is not full. I know, for instance, that during the last Congress, possibly the preceding Congress, there was appointed to represent my Congressional district, the northeastern or Third district of the State of Nebraska, a boy from the District of Columbia, who perhaps was never 10 miles west of this city, and the thousands of boys in that district who are competent and are perfectly willing to represent the district in the Military Academy were deprived of their right to do so in consequence of that appointment.

The Senator from Nebraska may be correct in the statement that there was some failure to make an appointment upon the recommendation of a member, but, if so, it must have been to a cadetship in the Naval Academy. I took pains to inquire carefully into this matter, and I shall submit, and ask to have incorporated, for the information of the Senator from Nebraska, as I do not see him present, and for the information of others, a list of all the appointments that have been made to cadetships in the Military Academy since 1885 from the State of Nebraska. I will not ask the indulgence of the Senate to read it, but I ask that it be inserted in my remarks. It will be seen that not a single one was appointed except upon the recommendation of the proper Representative.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the paper will be printed in the RECORD.

It has for many years been the practice of the War Department to appoint cadets to the Military Academy from Congressional districts upon the nomination of members of Congress. This practice is never departed from.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE, February 18, 1895.

Mr. VILAS. I wish to add a further remark in regard to this matter, in order to correct a mistake, which was somewhat a misapprehension, induced, perhaps, by the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska, and that was apparently accepted on the floor by other Senators. For over twenty years, the Adjutant-General of the Army informed me this morning, not a single appointment has been made to the Military Academy as a representative of a Congressional district or within that clause of the law which provides for the appointment of one cadet from each Congressional district, except upon the nomination of the Representative in Congress of that district. During the war, in consequence of the absence of Representatives from some of the States of the Union, the Secretary of War, or the President, did appoint a number of cadets assigned to those Congressional districts which were not then represented for certain reasons. After the war there was a single instance in a Congressional district in the State of New York in which Secretary Belknap appointed a cadet without its being made upon the recommendation of the Representative from the district; but it caused so much controversy and remonstrance that in the end I believe that appointment was not carried into effect.

One other instance, the Adjutant-General assured me, had been made in the course of his knowledge. There was a Congressional district in the State of Massachusetts whose Representative was of that religious faith which is of peace, a Quaker, and he was unwilling to recommend the education of a man of war, but consented to the Secretary of War making the appointment of the cadet from that district.

The Adjutant-General assures me that those are the only instances known to him of any violation of the observance of the appointment of cadets from the Congressional districts upon the nomination of the Representatives in Congress from those districts.

Mr. President, I think that statement is enough to show that we have no occasion to insert in the law the provision which I had the honor to submit in connection with the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska yesterday, and I believe he now agrees that if we shall simply provide a sufficient length of residence to make the residence actual and certain, he does not care to have it inserted. I am willing to agree to it if there be no objection in the Senate; so that the amendment shall read:

The two appointed at large from each State shall have been for two years actual residents of the State—and the others shall have been for two years actual residents of the Congressional or Territorial district, etc.

It now reads "shall be actual residents"—

And I will suggest that it be amended by striking out the word "be" in the seventh line and the word "be" in the eighth line and inserting the words "have been for two years" in each case.

Mr. HILL. What does the Senator mean by the words "actual residents"?

Mr. VILAS. That is the language of the law as it is. It is copied from the Revised Statutes as it has stood ever since they were adopted.

Mr. HILL. The residence might be out of the State.

Mr. VILAS. I presume it means not a mere legal or constructive residence, but that the appointee shall be a genuine actual resident of the district or the State.

Mr. HILL. Of course, the residence of a minor follows legally the residence of his father. A boy might have been out of the State to school. Why do you put in the word "actual" there? The boy may have been to a boarding school out of the State. Is not the word "residence" sufficient? I only ask the question.

Mr. VILAS. I readily recognize the force of the observation of the Senator from New York as a matter of argument, but that word has stood in the Revised Statutes for more than twenty years without causing the least trouble that I happen to be aware of. Nobody has challenged it.

Mr. HILL. Then it must have been held to have no particular significance.

Mr. MILLS. The actual residence of the boy would be the actual residence of his father.

Mr. VILAS. I think so. I do not think it cuts much figure. I agree with the Senator from New York about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment as modified by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The SECRETARY. In line 7 strike out the word "be" and insert in lieu thereof the words "have been for two years," and in line 8 strike out the word "be" and insert the words "shall have been for two years"; so that it will read:

The two appointed at large from each State shall have been for two years actual residents of the State from which they are appointed, and the others shall have been for two years actual residents of the Congressional or Territorial districts, or the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Wisconsin now accepts the amendment suggested by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. VILAS. If there be no other objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the question recurs on the adoption of the amendment as now read.

Mr. TELLER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. VILAS. I wish to add a word or two. I have not finished the remarks I desire to submit to the Senate in connection with it.

Mr. TELLER. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought he had concluded.

Mr. VILAS. Not quite. I wish to make another remark. Something was said in reference to the President's appointment of the ten and something in complaint of an alleged practice, it is said, to appoint too much from the District of Columbia. I wish to remark in regard to this point that during the two terms of the present Executive the practice has been, as I was assured by the Adjutant-General, universally to select the son of some officer of the Army or someone in direct descent from a deceased officer of the Army, so that the children of the meritorious and useful military persons of this country should be recognized in that way as worthy of the military instruction which the country provides. I think that must have been in truth the design of the law. At all events, I believe not only President Cleveland but General Harrison and other Presidents have followed the same practice. It is by no means a new idea.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me?

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I think that provision was put in with the distinct understanding that the President should be allowed in that way to take the sons and descendants of army officers who had practically no fixed residence.

Mr. VILAS. I suppose that was the object of it.

Mr. TELLER. That was the object of the provision.

Mr. BATE. And that that idea might be carried out to a fuller extent, it was urged in committee by persons interested in the Army that the number of appointments given to the President should be extended to 20 instead of 10.

Mr. VILAS. I wish the number had been preserved; but the Committee on Military Affairs chose to leave the law as it is in that respect and I have not raised any point upon it. I ought to add, to be exact, that this is the practice, not alone in respect to the sons or grandsons of officers of the Army, but of the Navy also, who are occasionally appointed in this way.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. VILAS. It may happen that from that practice a number have been designated as residents of the District of Columbia, because officers may be residing here in the District of Columbia. In a great many cases they have no local affiliation so that they can designate any State as the State of their residence. But nobody can for an instant doubt the excellence of that practice. Let me mention as illustrative of it that there are two wishes now in existence which it will be some day, undoubtedly, the pleasure, as he will feel it the duty, of the Chief Executive of this nation to execute. The illustrious general who commanded our armies at the close of the war left his letter to the President of the United States, requesting, when his grandson became of sufficient age, that he might be educated at the Military Academy, and a son who bears the illustrious name of Philip H. Sheridan carries also a letter from that distinguished and noble soldier of similar purport, and either one of them will be respected as sacred wishes.

Mr. President, a word or two in respect to the scope of this amendment. The distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] asked what was the purpose of the amendment in respect to the extent to which it would carry into civil life the instructed pupils of the Military Academy. I should like to answer him by quoting a recommendation made by the Board of Visitors in the year 1893, of which the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] was the president, and which was concurred in by the entire Board. At that time Mr. Justice White was his associate appointee from the Senate. The language of that recommendation in brief is this:

The Board is impressed with the belief that the Academy should be required to educate as many young men as its capacity will justify. Any policy which fails to secure to the nation the full benefit of the institution in the education and training of its young men is neither economical nor wise.

The amendment which I have proposed is precisely in line with that recommendation. The capacity of the Military Academy now is equal to the reception of this additional number. There might be some little change required in the barracks, but they are sufficient, as shown by the report of the adjutant of the post, given in the report for this year of the Board of Visitors. The instructional force is substantially adequate. Not more than four or five or possibly a half dozen subaltern officers, if any at all, and I think none, would be required to be added for the full instruction. There is involved, therefore, in this proposal practically nothing except the additional pay of the cadets.

Sir, it may be true that if the policy were to be distinctly adopted that we are to educate a considerable number of young men for civil life at the Military Academy, a greater addition to the cadetship ought to be provided than this will provide; but let us not go too fast. We have there the means; we are now seeking only to use those means according to their capacity. I showed yesterday that the cost to the United States of the education of a single cadet at that establishment exceeds a thousand dollars per year, while in ordinary colleges the cost hardly exceeds $125 per pupil per annum. Let us avail ourselves of this expenditure. I ask for no retrenchment of the expenditure; I believe it is well and wisely made; but let us avail ourselves of the fruits which it is equal to realizing for the country.

The Senator from New Hampshire says that perhaps this might result in there being some men left at the end of the period of instruction who could not be assigned and would be obliged to be sent to private life, and therefore there might be some stigma in connection with it. He really answered that objection himself by saying that in the course of his experience with the Naval Academy, and we all know how great it was, he had found that when there were so many as fifteen or twenty to be sent to private life at the end of the course of instruction there was felt to be no imputation upon any. This will provide, I hope and I believe, about that number to be sent back to private life every year from the graduates of the institution. If so, we at once avoid that criticism upon the limited increase to the cadetship which is now proposed.

But, let me ask for a moment, if we do not need much more than that in the country? We have not simply an Army of the United States, for whose experience and power we ought to provide. The Regular Army of the United States, which to-day alone is supplied with instructed officers through this institution, is a body of 25,000 or 30,000 men. When the 70,000,000 people of the United States shall engage in war it is much more probable that the number of the Army will be 250,000, or mayhap 500,000, and where shall we find the instructed officers to immediately organize and put into active service such enormous battalions as our great population and our strength would undoubtedly require us to provide for the exigencies of a war such as we are likely to engage in, if in any? I trust and believe there can be no prospect of any anywhere in the sky.

The Senator from New Hampshire also spoke of the necessity of a similar course of proceeding with reference to the Naval Academy. I do not know that the Senator from New Hampshire meant to put that in as an objection to the adoption of this amendment, nor am I able to discuss the question with him whether or not there should be an increase in the Naval Academy. He is far better instructed in the conditions which affect that institution than I am; but I will draw his attention to one or two features of difference between the Naval Academy and the Military Academy in the possible usefulness of this course of procedure.

We do not keep in our various States any body of naval recruits, any body of seamen. We have no organizations intended to be used upon the sea, except what is called a Naval Reserve, quite insignificant in number, at this time amounting to but very little, and the Naval Reserve, wherever it exists, is chiefly, I think, upon the coast. Now, in every State of the Union there is a body of militia, generally designated as the National Guard of that particular State. I think that it would be a service for which we could well afford the money to pay, which it would be well for us to enter upon the execution of, to provide that the various States should have instructed officers, who shall be competent to teach the National Guard all that can be taught or is needed to be taught to them in the way of military discipline. We shall perhaps thus have the skeleton of an army upon which we can build with the rapidity which occasion demands. We have proceeded in all our history, and hitherto without default in time of trial, upon the theory that it is better to have a small army and a live, active, vigorous, dauntless, free people from which to form an army in time of war, with sufficient means only in instructed men at hand to organize them into proper corps and lead them into whatever service may be required.

There is a very great difference between the Army and the Navy, therefore, in the need, as it seems to me, of having a class of men instructed who shall take their places in civil life. I shall not pause at this hour to elaborate the argument. I suggest it as a sufficient distinction now, by no means intending to antagonize by it any proposal which at a proper time may be made, if any shall be made, in reference to the Navy. Let that take care of itself according to reasons which may be presented in reference to it.

Mr. President, I shall take only the further time in the discussion of this amendment to say that it has had for a great many years the approbation of the instructional force and the superintendent of West Point, together with the commandant of cadets. It has had the continuous recommendation of every Board of Visitors which has examined that institution for years. It may happen that not always has that recommendation been written in the report, though it has been repeatedly reiterated. It has had, as is evidenced upon this floor, the constant and continued recommendation of the Secretaries of War. We have here two gentlemen, distinguished upon this floor and in the country, who have occupied the post of Secretary of War. Both of them are here to speak for the desirability of the amendment.

We know with what difficulty changes in our law of any kind are accomplished, what a tremendous power the power of inertia is even in the words of law; and I trust that the Senate now will adopt this modest, this very gentle step toward the accomplishment of a reformation by which only the power of the Military Academy is to be used, as we now maintain it, simply for the benefit of the country to the extent to which we expend money to make it useful, and that in the end the committee which may have charge of this matter, if the Senate shall adopt it, will feel that the Senate desires this amendment to be made to the law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], upon which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] has demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. CALL and Mr. PROCTOR. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following as an additional section:

SEC. 2. That the corps of cadets shall consist of two from each State at large, one from each Congressional district, one from each Territory, one from the District of Columbia, and ten from the United States at large. They shall be appointed by the President, and those appointed at large may be residents anywhere in the Union. The two appointed at large from each State shall have been for two years actual residents of the State from which they are appointed, and the others shall have been for two years actual residents of the Congressional or Territorial districts or the District of Columbia, respectively, from which they purport to be appointed. Any graduates unassigned to existing vacancies within one year after their graduation shall be honorably discharged from the service: Provided, That the President may, in his discretion, appoint to vacancies in the grade of second lieutenant any meritorious soldier of the Army, when recommended according to the provisions of the acts of June 18, 1878, and July 30, 1892, although graduates of the Military Academy may remain in service unassigned.

Mr. VILAS. The paragraph in the amendment as it now stands, which reads—

which was inserted upon the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], I believe he agrees ought to have one qualification. That qualification I move to place there by inserting, after the word "graduation," the words "except those in the Engineer Corps."

That amendment is proposed upon the recommendation of the Department, received to-day, on this ground: The Engineer Corps receives regularly from the Academy one, two, three, rarely over four, of the graduating class, as specially recommended by reason of their success in scholarship and their peculiar attainments for the engineering branch of the service. It sometimes happens, I am told by officers of that corps, that no one is recommended from the graduating class as sufficient in qualification and character for assignment to the Engineer Corps. Therefore it has been the practice to hold over the second lieutenants appointed as additional lieutenants for such vacancies as may occur in the Engineer Corps, because they do not occur in anything like regular number. Sometimes there is a considerable number of vacancies, at others the vacancies are few, and they regard it as especially desirable that all second lieutenants specially recommended by the graduating board shall be held in the Engineer Corps, and additional lieutenants to fill such vacancies as are required by the peculiar nature of that establishment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "graduation" it is proposed to strike out the words "except those in the Engineer Corps"; so as to read:

Any graduates unassigned to existing vacancies within one year after their graduation shall be honorably discharged from the service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I understand that the amendment comes practically from the Committee on Military Affairs; it certainly has not been considered by the Committee on Appropriations. It is a pointed illustration, in my judgment, of the impolicy of placing general legislation upon appropriation bills in this body. In the body in which appropriation bills originate they are considered by committees who are in charge of the special subjects-matter, and the rules governing in that branch would prohibit the possibility of such legislation as is here proposed. Under our rules I suppose this amendment might have been excluded. I believe the Senator from Colorado having the bill in charge has not made the point of order that the amendment proposes general legislation; but it is important legislation, Mr. President. It is a subject which I think ought to be thoroughly considered in a separate bill. It provides practically for the appointment of a cadet to West Point by each Senator in this body. To my mind it is a most objectionable form of legislation, for it is a matter which comes home to each one of us. The proposed increase may be proper and right in itself—I do not discuss that at this time—but it ought not to be put on an appropriation bill when it comes so near to each of us on this floor.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] assigns as a reason that the facilities at the Academy are such that the increased number of cadets proposed to be provided for can be educated there without additional cost, except as to the mere matter of pay. It so happens that for the past six or eight years, and I take it it has been the case from the beginning with the War Department, the Board of Visitors to West Point and all who are concerned in looking especially into this institution have been to Congress and to the Committee on Appropriations insisting upon increased facilities and increased buildings for the accommodation of the present corps. It has not been two years since we were called upon to increase the facilities to accommodate the number of cadets now provided for by law. If the Senator from Wisconsin be correct, the improvements that were made at West Point for the number of cadets now authorized by law will be taken advantage of by the increased number he proposes to provide.

Mr. President, there may be necessity for an increased number of these young men at both the Naval Academy and at West Point, but it will not stop with the increase of these educated officers. It means with the Army and with the Navy largely increased appropriations for the men in those two services.

Mr. GEORGE. The men for the officers to command?

Mr. GORMAN. The men for the officers to command. One year ago we provided $500,000 for an increase of a thousand men in the Navy.

Mr. BATE. There is a clause in the amendment which covers that objection; that is to say, where there are no vacancies under the law as it now exists and there are no places for the surplus men, they shall be retired after one year to civil life. I have had the same opinion the Senator from Maryland has in regard to this increase, but that has been guarded against in this bill.

While I am up, I will say in regard to legislation upon appropriation bills that I think the practice generally is radically wrong. This, however, is a peculiar amendment. It applies especially to West Point, the appropriations contained in this bill are for West Point, and this appertains directly to it. It does not come exactly under the condemnation of ordinary legislation on appropriation bills.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I know that there never has been a case yet presented where there were not some good reasons given for adopting it on an appropriation bill. That always comes, and it is the most difficult matter to resist it. The present distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and those who preceded him, as well as all the members of that committee, know how difficult it is to object to a provision of this character, and the tendency of the Senate always is to permit a vote unless in the concluding hours of a session.

If we are to increase the Army and the Navy, as has been proposed in the many bills and propositions pending before Congress, it ought to be done separately. We have been and we are increasing the Navy, a thousand men last year and 2,000 men are wanted this year, and as we go on and construct ships two or three thousand men will be necessary within the next three or four years in a time of peace.

In the Navy there may be, and I think there is, a necessity for a slight annual increase to man the ships we have already constructed and those which we shall be obliged to construct. In the matter of the Army it is a different question. We have a magnificent body of men drilled by the States, the great volunteer army, that is ready to meet any emergency, officered—and they can be officered as they were in the last war—by the skilled men who are found in the walks of private life, who have never passed through and who never can pass through one of these military institutions.

I do not, for one, believe that it is wise for us at this time, or at any time except in an emergency, to increase the standing Army of the United States. I would provide a proper number of ships, which must be built for the Government; I would provide proper armament for our ports on the coast, and rely upon the people at the proper time to furnish the necessary men and officers for the service of the Government. I do not believe in our present condition that we should be preparing for the increase in the Army, which, in my judgment, will follow this proposition.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE], who, I know, has given great attention to this subject and has carefully looked into the conditions at West Point, has possibly not yet felt, but he will feel, the pressure from all the men who pass through these institutions to secure for them commands. It will come, Mr. President. This is but the beginning. I do not believe—and this is all I intended to say when I rose—that it is proper to make that beginning upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to call his attention to the fact that the United States Government donates every year $15,000, and it will soon be $25,000, under the Morrill Act, to the land-grant colleges? Those colleges are compelled by law to teach military tactics, and each one of them has a West Pointer detailed to drill those schoolboys. They are furnishing all the military training that this country needs.

Mr. BATE. In that connection, I will say the law allows a hundred at least for that purpose, and now there are many colleges who can not secure the detail of officers for that service.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, Mr. President; officers are detailed to these colleges; they are detailed as aids to the governors of States, and they are detailed to all sorts of schools of training, so that we have now more than can be utilized for the purposes of the Army, and enough for all the details required by law for the colleges and the States.

Mr. BATE. There are colleges applying to have officers detailed to instruct their pupils in military discipline who can not get them now, owing to the fact that sufficient money is not appropriated, although the law allows such details. It has never been possible to assign to the colleges the number of officers required in that direction.

Mr. GORMAN. I had supposed that all the assignments were made. However that may be, I believe that this matter ought to be taken up and discussed upon its own merits, and without reference to an appropriation bill.

After what I have read in the newspapers of the comments made elsewhere upon this body for making appropriations, that we have assumed a right which does not exist, and practically it was claimed that we had no right to amend an appropriation bill or to make provision for the support of the Government and the payment of the claims and judgments against it—there has been talk of the Senate riding with hobnailed shoes over a coordinate branch of the Government.

The Senate, of course, will resent any such imputation, because it has the right to amend appropriation bills and to provide for the support of the Government; and, as was well stated by the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], it is the duty of the Senate to make such appropriations. It has always exercised the right, and has had the courage to make appropriations sufficient to pay the current expenses of the Government; but I doubt the propriety of the policy, Mr. President, and I think the Senate weakens its position with the country when, out of order, it proposes to amend an appropriation bill, no matter how much merit there may be in the proposition, by giving to each Senator the right to name a young man to go to West Point. I do not believe we can maintain our position in so doing. I do not think that we can insist upon such a measure upon an appropriation bill; and I think it would be misunderstood everywhere.

Outside of the question of the increase of the Army, I should like to see this body go on as it has in the past, increasing appropriations where the necessities of the Government require it and in conformity to law, but to avoid all such propositions as are now pending.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, as to the propriety of putting legislation of this kind upon an appropriation bill, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] to the fact that it has been done every year for a great many years in a matter quite related to this. If he will omit the inhibition against more soldiers than 25,000, which appears every year in the Army appropriation bill, the existing and continuing statute will apply, providing for an army of 30,000. That is the law of the country to-day, and it is only by every year forbidding more than 25,000 that the number is kept down to 25,000.

I remember very well when that was done in another place. A gentleman who had not considered the question at all jumped up and moved that it should not be more than 25,000 men enlisted for the year under the money appropriated, or words to that effect. It seemed to meet the feeling of the House of Representatives, which is the body to which I refer, and it has been renewed every year since then.

I say frankly that having doubled in population since that inhibition was established, we need a larger police. Whenever there is a serious disturbance of any kind—none involving foreign nations has come upon us—and such a disturbance is likely to come among 70,000,000 people, some of whom are uneasy, then you have to transport your little body of troops, all you can gather together, to the point where they are needed. You can not afford to collect in one body more than two or three thousand troops, as you have not more than 23,000 when you should have 25,000. They must stay in certain places to protect property. You have to collect and weed out and shift and run them out on trains, with a very heavy bill of expense, and they perhaps arrive at the place after the damage has been done. As an internal police we ought to have not less than 25,000 soldiers if it were right to have 30,000 twenty-five years ago.

Our friend says that the volunteers, right out of the population, who had not drilled a day, made their own officers well enough in the late war. I know something about it myself, sir. I know that as a captain, to which grade I was unwillingly advanced when I tried to be a first lieutenant, I hunted around for young men who knew how to drill; how to teach not only my men, but myself. I found them, happily, some of them in a good military school in my State, and then we got West Point officers to help us. A good many months elapsed, not to say years, as some men would say, before we all became what soldiers should be, well-trained soldiers, accustomed to all the necessary maneuvers, and before the officers became really fit to be trusted to take men in battle except when the exigencies were such that we had to die at least if we could not drill or march or change our formation.

You might as well argue that special training is of no advantage in any pursuit anywhere. I do not know any place where it is of as much importance as it is in the conduct of an army upon which depends the lives of tens and hundreds of thousands of men and the expenditure of hundreds and thousands of millions of dollars. It is there important, and the officers feel it. No general officer, or captain either, can say he does not feel the tremendous responsibility, the poignant regret that he was not better prepared for that place, and how often he criticises himself after an expedition or a battle, finds fault with himself, and says he ought to have known better.

No, sir; there is no place where training is more needed, and this little addition of about 17 a year, which I think it will give, will do us no hurt, for there is a great demand for these officers in the military schools and in the militia of the States. I am very glad to see that there is some measure proposed to provide for it. The boys, 12 or 15 years of age, in the military schools make but a beginning, but the instruction there is valuable, for it goes as far as squad drills and company drills if it does not involve the science of tactics or anything of that sort.

The idea that we can not amend in the manner proposed, that we can not add to the number of cadets, is very much as if we should say that we have no right to add to the number of clerks and employees of the Senate. Every year when we are making provision for the Senate under the legislative, executive, and judicial bill we assume to ourselves a perfect freedom and right to increase the number of any class of workmen and employees, I do not care what they are, and to change their compensation, to give a larger or smaller sum. The doctrine of the English House of Commons even does not apply here. They may not raise the appropriation above that which is dictated to them by their ministry. With due respect to what the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] stated the other day, in my judgment we have nothing to borrow from the processes of the great British Parliament. We assume the perfect right to increase or diminish the number and compensation of men for whom we are providing in an annual appropriation bill, and we have always done it.

I hope the amendment will be agreed to, and I am sure it will be to the good of the country.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I do not believe in taking any step at this time to increase the Regular Army. It may be necessary when building ships to increase the officers of the Navy to command those ships, but as was suggested by some Senator, we are already educating a vast number of young men. The agricultural schools provide pretty good military training. The officers of the Regular Army are doing very effective service in multiplying the number of young men capable of doing military service.

The States are organizing as they never did before, and at this time there should be no increase of the Army. There ought to be a decrease rather than an increase, from the fact that we have no more Indian wars. We have built railroads and settled up the territory all over the Indian country. So the soldiers we have have been brought to and concentrated about the cities. We do not want a large Army for that purpose. A very small Army is all that is necessary. Nobody is going to resist the United States forces. Things are very different now. There is nothing like the demand for a large Army that there was twenty years ago. So we ought to be decreasing rather than increasing the Army, it seems to me.

This is an entering wedge for increasing the Army, when we have made ample provision for educating a vast number of men for military service and when the States have taken an interest in it and have their volunteers and everything prepared to improvise a large army quickly. Now, when there is no use for it, to increase the standing army that is to be located in your cities will create a feeling of discontent among the people. They look upon the Government as tending toward monarchy and pomp and splendor. There is use to increase the number of officers of the Navy to command the ships, but there is no necessity for increasing the Army. Consequently, I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Besides, I do not think the Senate should be seeking patronage for itself. It looks as if we were reaching out for appointments, to which there will certainly be objection, unless there is some advantage to come to the country from it. I see that, and I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I think the amendment is subject to a point of order, but upon consulting with the chairman of the committee, we concluded, after the criticisms of the committee a few days ago as to arbitrary methods, that we would let the matter run and would not raise the question, and I do not desire to raise it now.

The estimates of the Department for the Military Academy were $619,169.61. The amount carried by the bill as it came from the other House was $448,117.61. To that we have added $3,000 in two items, one being for repairs to barracks of detachment of army service men and the other for fitting up the ordnance museum in the new Academy building. The proper officer stated that that was essential in order to have any use of that building. We have reduced some other items, so that the net increase on the bill as it came from the other House is only $2,408. The House committee, in reporting the bill to the House, make the following statement in their report:

> The following items in the estimates the committee believe to be desirable, but not essential, to the preservation of the property, or the actual needs of the institution, and have not, on account of the depleted condition of the Treasury, recommended them to the House.

They amount to $129,277, which they say are essential, but not absolutely necessary. Out of that sum we have taken $3,000, that the proper officer made the majority of the committee believe was essential to the building and for the use of the Academy.

The other House evidently did not intend that there should be any increase of the Army for any purpose, because, while providing for the detail of some enlisted men at the Academy, they make this statement:

> But the number of enlisted men of the Army shall not be increased on account of this proviso or the two preceding paragraphs of this act.

I do not mean to detain the Senate by any discussion, as I desire to get a vote. I wish to have a yea-and-nay vote on this question, because the committee are entitled to take the sense of the Senate on it, as we know it will meet with some opposition. But I merely wish to say that so far as I am personally concerned, I should be very glad always to be relieved of any patronage of this kind. I do not myself want any of it. I do not believe that there is any necessity for increasing our Army. I wish to say in reply to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] that I do not believe there is any occasion now, or that it is consistent with the genius of our Government that we should increase the National Army for police purposes. I recollect very distinctly that a number of years ago I broke away from my party in the Senate and voted with three other Republicans, and three others only, for a provision of law which, I think, still remains on the statute books, that the United States Army should only be used in such cases as are explicitly provided for by law.

I do not know whether it is always observed; possibly it is not; but I am one of those who do not believe that the General Government should attempt to police the States with the United States Army. I will never vote for the increase of the Army except it may be for the purpose of national defense, and I do not believe that any considerable number of the American people will ever be willing that the American Army shall act as a police force and discharge for the States the duties which the States are able to discharge for themselves.

The constabulary of a State is the police force, and the freedom of this country would be jeopardized by attempting to displace the constabulary of the States with the United States Army. Never since I have been in public life, now nearly twenty years, have I failed to enter my protest whenever it was suggested that the United States Army was to be taken from the high purpose for which it was created, that of national defense, and degraded, in my judgment, to the performance of the duties of constables or deputy sheriffs. We do not need any increase of the Army, and in my judgment we do not need any increase of cadets in the United States. It is true that we might in time of war avail ourselves of the skill of these young men, but in my opinion those who are so educated in the immediate future will be old men before there will be any occasion to call them into use, unless it may be for the purpose of putting down civil strife in this country.

There is no possibility, in my judgment, that any power will assail us. If any power does assail us, the contest will not be upon the land, but upon the water, and if we have any money to educate young men in any line of warfare, the suggestion made by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] is, I think, exceedingly pertinent, that it ought to be in the line of the naval forces and not of the land forces. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I beg pardon for troubling the Senate, but I wish to say just a few words more.

The distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] is of the opinion that while it is right and necessary to increase the number of enlisted men in the Navy—and that is obvious to everybody—there is no such necessity in the case of the Army. The Navy is hopeless without a good system of coast defense. There must be strong forts, there must be large docks, there must be magazines of cannon and ammunition, and all that at our principal ports which can be defended not more by the Navy outside than by the forts; and the harbors there must be harbors of refuge for a retreating force, and also harbors of supply. If we are to go on with anything like a systematic and partially thorough system of coast defense it will be utterly and absolutely useless unless there be some force of men to take care of it in case of necessity. Of all things, the greatest waste of money is the use of raw men in the handling of great guns where it costs $500 to fire a single shot.

I will not discuss at any length the propriety of providing for a good Army—though an exceedingly small one in the judgment of the world—because that is not a practical question on the pending bill, but I think the Army is at a safe point; it is a factor of safety, as the engineers say, when we have but one soldier out of 2,800 of our population, and there is no danger in an increase of 3,000 or so.

The Senator from Colorado denounced the use of the Army for police duty. So do I in the sense in which he describes it; but, of course, I did not mean the ordinary brass-buttoned man with a locust stick, walking about the street. I mean that higher police which is behind the majesty of the country and behind the majesty of a State. Civil government is not worth a farthing unless there be behind the sheriff a colonel and behind the marshal a regiment or a brigade to be used in the execution of the law, though never to fire a shot except where repeated warnings have failed to stop men from destroying property or openly defying national laws.

I understand those limitations. I accept them. I am a strict constructionist in all that regard. But I do not care to be always telling the world, not as anyone does here, but some men are always saying to the people of the United States that there is no necessity for a soldier and no necessity for force or anything of that sort. That is false mercy. The time has come when that sort of talk is simply murder; that is all.

Mr. TELLER. I agree with the Senator from Connecticut that behind the sheriff there may properly be a colonel with a regiment, but according to my doctrine it should be a colonel of the State, not a colonel of the United States. He should act under the authority of the State. The State is derelict when it does not protect national property, when it does not protect transportation, when it does not protect the mails. The State should do it with its constabulary first, if it can, and if it can not do it in that way, then let it do it with its militia—its soldiery. That is the way to maintain peace and order in this country; that is the way to maintain liberty and law.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator from Colorado is exactly right again, and yet quite wrong at the same time. Of course, behind the sheriff stands the colonel, and they should cover the larger part of the great field of armed defense of our liberties and laws; but there are times when they are insufficient (and the very emergency is provided for in the Constitution) to do this, and when governors and legislatures have called for help. We remember when they did do it. How was it at Chicago? Was there no necessity under the sun? Was it thought folly and crime that Miles should march down from Fort Sheridan with his troops? Did not every man in the United States acknowledge the propriety of it? Was not life saved and property saved and the majesty of the Federal law saved when the blue coats, riding into Pittsburg, quelled the mob at the very sight of them?

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I wish to say a single word. I shall vote against the pending amendment, but I shall not do it because I think legislation ought not to be placed upon an appropriation bill. I shall not do it because I think it would increase the standing Army of the United States, although I never would vote for a single addition of a man to the standing Army of the United States except when war is imminent. I would vote for the amendment with pleasure to give to the young men of this country an opportunity of the highest military education that the present capacity of the two Academies will permit. But there is no provision in the amendment for the Academy at Annapolis and for the Navy, which is the most important branch of our armed service. It is far more important, in view of any possible contingencies, than any other species of military education. Under those circumstances, with an amendment imperfectly prepared, doing this great injustice to the naval branch of the service, I shall vote against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], upon which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have so much of the amendment read as provides for the appointment of cadets on a recommendation by Senators. It was not a part of the original amendment.

Mr. VILAS. It is not in the amendment now.

Mr. TELLER. It is not in now.

Mr. VILAS. It was withdrawn.

Mr. HOAR. How are they to be appointed?

Mr. VILAS. Just as they are—four by the President.

Mr. CULLOM. Let the pending amendment be read, so that we may know exactly how it stands.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to try the sense of the Senate on the proviso which the clerks will find in substance near the bottom of the first column of page 1796 of the RECORD. I suggest the following modification of the language appearing there:

That the two cadets at large shall be appointed only on the written recommendation of the governor of the State from which they are accredited, and all cadets, etc.

I should like to move it in that shape. I think it would tend very much to popularize West Point and make it in the interest of the people to give the governors of the States the appointments at large. Probably the Senator from Wisconsin will accept it. Let the Secretary read it, substituting for the word "Senators" the words "governor of the State."

Mr. TELLER. The Senator proposes that the governor shall recommend the appointment?

Mr. HOAR. Yes; that it shall be made on the recommendation of the governor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the amendment the following proviso:

Provided, That the two cadets at large shall be appointed only on the written recommendation of the governor of the State to which they are accredited, and all cadets, except those reserved to the President by general law, shall be made only on the written recommendation of the Representative of the Congressional district or Territory to which they are respectively accredited.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate, but I should like to say one word in favor of the amendment which I have proposed. This is a provision for the appointment of the two cadets at large from each State. As the Senator from Wisconsin finally left it, that appointment is to be made wholly by the President. The Senators, I understand, are not proposed to be included at all. Now, it is pretty difficult to get to the President from distant parts of the country the qualifications of a boy 15 or 16 or 17 years old. Several Senators have thought it would create great jealousy in the House, or injure the Senate in the estimation of the country, if we insert this as a matter of patronage to ourselves; but I do not suppose any Senator cares about having the responsibility thrust on him of selecting one cadet. He will disappoint forty or fifty every time he gratifies one. On the other hand, I propose that the recommendation shall be made by the governor of the State. Take a State like Oregon, or California, or Nebraska, or any of the more distant States. It is very difficult for the President to know much about the boys whom he selects. So if we do not give the power of recommending to the Senators it seems to me it is very proper to have the President make the appointment on the recommendation of the governor.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is not for me to show any special solicitude for the Constitution of the United States lest the Senator from Massachusetts should neglect that time-honored instrument, but it does occur to me that as the cadets are officers of the United States there is an impropriety in requiring by law that the President of the United States shall appoint a particular United States officer only on the recommendation of the governor of the State. It strikes me that there is an incongruity, a mixing up of national and State functions that would be unwise even in so little a matter as this. I should defer to the mature judgment of the Senator from Massachusetts, but it seems to me that his hasty suggestion in this regard may fairly be open to constitutional objection.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will defer to the mature judgment of the Senator from Massachusetts. If he does, he will vote for the amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have made that promise, but I shall have a constitutional scruple all the same.

Mr. HOAR. The appointment in all cases comes from the President of the United States. The Constitution provides that officers of the United States shall be appointed only by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, but that Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments, with a special provision regarding the officers of the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. BATE. Do I understand that it is proposed the governor shall have the power of appointment, or that he would merely recommend the appointment to the President?

Mr. HOAR. The governor will only recommend the appointment to the President. It is just as much a compliance with the Constitution to have the President make the appointment on the recommendation of the governor of a State as the present arrangement for both the schools is that he shall make it on the recommendation of a legislative officer. Our constitutional theories keep legislative officers out of executive appointments, but still we allow the sense of the State or district to be conveyed to the President by the recommendation of the officer. It is not an improper thrusting into the national arrangement when you consult an executive of the State about the opinion of the people or the fitness of a particular person in his State.

The Constitution of the United States itself confers upon the executive of the State the great function of appointing members of this body when the legislature fails to elect. This is merely a mode by which the President is to be instructed in an official, authoritative, and formal way, in a manner which he can not get at without the instruction of somebody. So either this function is to be conferred upon the Senator, to whom it will be nothing but a plague, especially in great States like New York, Pennsylvania, or Virginia, or it is to be conferred on the President alone.

Now, how difficult, how annoying it will be for the President of the United States to make selections, especially from distant parts of the country, between the recommendations of the interested friends of these boys. The governor is on the spot. I think this little arrangement, if it were to be adopted, would do more to make West Point and the Naval Academy popular than anything else we could do. I do not find any difficulty at all either in the letter of the Constitution or in its spirit and arrangement.

Mr. CHANDLER. The fact still remains that these cadets are officers of the United States, and if the President is authorized to appoint them only on the recommendation of the governors of the States, then the governors participate in the appointment of every one.

Mr. HOAR. Has not the Representative the appointing power now?

Mr. CHANDLER. Then it is constitutional to require that when the President appoints a circuit judge or a district judge of the United States he shall have the nomination of the governor. The governor is on the spot; the Senator says the governor knows more about the citizens of the locality than the President does. It must be extremely awkward for the President to obtain his knowledge from the residence and locality, and so the governors of the States can suggest or nominate to the President the judges more conveniently than if the President alone has the appointing power.

Mr. HOAR. The President of the United States knows personally and by observation the character of the great jurists of all the country, and I do not find in that suggestion the mature judgment of my honorable friend from New Hampshire. But let me ask the Senator if he is in favor of the present law applicable to the Naval Academy at Annapolis, that of the nomination made by the President of the United States only upon the recommendation of a Representative from a distance? If he is, he is violating a constitutional principle, if that is what this accomplishes, because he is thrusting a member of a legislative body into the function of an executive appointment.

Mr. CHANDLER. Since this debate has commenced I am inclined to think that the provision in reference to the naval cadets which does not exist with reference to cadets at West Point is unconstitutional.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is my impression. I have been convinced by the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts that it is unconstitutional. Now, it is a constitutional question, and it is not a question of convenience. If it were a question of convenience, then the same law might apply to the appointment of collectors of customs.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask whether it is also unconstitutional to provide that the President shall appoint through the Civil Service Commission to the Executive Departments?

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not think it is. I think that is a wise and proper limitation and regulation of the appointing power. It is not at all like a case where the President is prohibited from making an appointment except on the nomination of the governor of a State. If this rule is applied here it can be applied just as well to the appointment of a collector of customs. I am very certain that if the Senator from Massachusetts thinks this matter over for a day or two his views will be the other way.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me one sentence only, which is that the logic of the Senator from New Hampshire would make unconstitutional all the legislation in which he has himself so often participated, where we enact that the President of the United States may appoint a single named individual to the Army and then put him on the retired list or otherwise, as the case may be, which has been expressly adjudged constitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Massachusetts knows very well that I do think it is unconstitutional, and have always thought so since the veto in the Fitz John Porter case, for Congress to pass a law, create an office, and then name the officer to fill it, whom the President must appoint if he appoints anyone. I did not know that the Supreme Court had decided otherwise. I should like to have the Senator from Massachusetts call that decision to my attention. Nothing is clearer in my mind; and I adhere to my constitutional opinions just as tenaciously as the Senator from Massachusetts does, and I yield them just as unwillingly to a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States as he does. Nothing is more unconstitutional than to pass an act and make an office and name the man to fill it. It can not constitutionally be done by Congress, even if it is done as a matter of fact every day in the week.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, that is right. Both the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Massachusetts are right. But I have not heard the matter alluded to, which undoubtedly is true, that there is nowhere in the statutes of the United States now a provision of law that authorizes a Representative in Congress to nominate a cadet to the Military Academy. The custom of appointing the nominees of Representatives in Congress has grown up as a matter of courtesy on the part of the Executive, and it has obtained so long that the popular impression has gone out that the Representative in Congress has, as the phrase goes, an appointment to West Point or an appointment to the Naval Academy. So uniformly has that custom been carried out that by the——

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, the provision is in regard to the Naval Academy. The Senator will observe when I put my question to the Senator from New Hampshire I selected the Naval Academy and not West Point for the very reason the Senator states, that it was only a custom in regard to the latter.

Mr. GRAY. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to allow the governor to nominate two cadets at large from each State as an amendment to the proposal of the Senator from Wisconsin is put upon the ground that it would popularize these institutions. I do not see how the nomination of the governor would tend to make the Academies more popular than the nominations by Senators or the nominations by Representatives.

If the provision of the Senator from Wisconsin should become a law, I presume that the Executive would establish the custom of nominating the cadets at large upon the suggestion of Senators from the different States just as they are nominated from the districts on the suggestion of the Representatives, and I should think that that would be quite as popular a way of getting at the sentiment of the State, and distributing the benefits of the Academies, as the nomination by a governor. I for one should prefer that method. I do not hesitate to say that it is not because I want patronage, for I do not want it, but I think it would be a better way, if the Executive should adopt it, to distribute the cadets evenly over the country, so that those who are appointed at large should be nominated upon the suggestion of the Representatives and Senators. Therefore I am opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I ventured to suggest yesterday as an amendment to make this whole subject clear that the cadets at large from the State shall be appointed upon the recommendation of the Senators from the State. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] accepted that amendment, and I thought it was a part of the present amendment before the Senate, but it has vanished somehow or other. Now, I am opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, and after it is voted upon, if it is voted down, which I hope it will be, I shall offer the amendment which I tried to get adopted yesterday, providing that the appointments at large shall be made upon the recommendations of the Senators.

I shall do this for another reason. My friend, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], has constitutional scruples. He is restless enough now, and I do not want to add to his restlessness for the remainder of the session by having him carry around this about the Constitution. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ELKINS. Now, in order to settle this question clearly, I wish the Senator from Wisconsin would accept the amendment that I intend to propose. I propose to amend the amendment so as to make the clause read:

That the two cadets appointed at large from each State shall be actual residents of the State from which they are appointed, and they shall be appointed on the recommendation of each of the Senators from such State.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President——

Mr. ELKINS. Will the Senator from Wisconsin accept that amendment?

Mr. VILAS. I was about to say that if I were to express my choice as to recommendation I should prefer the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, believing that it would be better that the governor of the State should have this power of nomination than that Senators should take it upon themselves. But if it is objectionable that we shall limit it in that way (and I think that objection was recognized as having great force in the vote of the Senate which has just been heard), that objection exists just as much to this as to the other recommendation. If the Constitution vests the right of Congress to authorize the appointment by the President alone, then we execute that part of the Constitution only when we give the President power to appoint alone. If, on the other hand, we are to exercise the other branch of the constitutional authority and give the President power to appoint by and with the consent of the Senate, that can be done only by the consent of the Senate in proper manner.

This subject was thoroughly ventilated. The Senator from Nebraska considered it himself carefully and suggested, or at least agreed to, the idea that if two years' actual residence were provided for in the amendment as it is now proposed, there would be no risk of any abuse, and the amendment was left in that way, in accordance with his judgment. I really hope the Senator from West Virginia will not insist upon that idea.

Mr. FRYE. Before the Senator sits down let me ask him if he has the slightest doubt but that the two cadets at large will be appointed by the President, on the recommendation of the Senators, whether the provision in the bill says so or not?

Mr. VILAS. I have not the slightest doubt, and I called attention to-day to the fact—I think the Senator from Maine was not present at the time——

Mr. FRYE. No; I am running Pacific railroads now all the time.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator is very competent to run anything he sets his hand on.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VILAS. In just a moment. I was going to add that in the whole course of the existence of the statute which gives the power of appointment to the President of one in each Congressional district, it has invariably been exercised, with a very limited exception, which I explained, by the Representative in Congress from that district.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator, who has stated that he has no doubt what the President will do, whether he feels authorized to speak for any President who may be in office after the term of the present Administration expires. [Laughter.]

Mr. VILAS. I have quite as much authority to speak for one as for the other.

Mr. ELKINS. It seems that the law regulating the appointment of cadets at Annapolis expressly states that it shall be done upon the recommendation of the Representative from the district. Now, why not make this provision plain and beyond a doubt? The Senator from Massachusetts offers his amendment upon the ground that the governors might make the recommendation. There is nothing in the amendment as it reads now to prevent the President of the United States from taking the advice of the governor of a State, and inasmuch as it is new legislation, not new in the sense that it offends the Appropriations Committee or the Senator from Maryland, but it is legislation germane to the pending bill—why not have it exact and definite while we are passing on the subject and not leave it in doubt? I will ask that the amendment that I offered to the amendment may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from West Virginia to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin will be read.

The SECRETARY. In line 9 of the amendment, after the word "appointed," insert:

Shall be appointed on the recommendation of each of the Senators from such State.

Mr. ELKINS. That is right.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the adoption of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS].

Mr. TELLER. On that let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], who, I see, is not in his seat. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MCMILLAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. TURPIE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS]. He being absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. VILAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], which I should like to transfer, with the consent of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN], to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], as those Senators stood paired on another question the other day. I will vote "yea," if the Senator from Michigan will agree to that transfer.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That arrangement is satisfactory to me, and I vote "yea."

Mr. TURPIE (when Mr. VOORHEES's name was called). My colleague [Mr. VOORHEES] is detained at home by indisposition. I do not know how he would wish to vote on the pending question, and I therefore have not sought a pair for him.

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY], and vote "yea."

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE], and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SHOUP. Having a general pair with the senior Senator from California [Mr. WHITE], and he having informed me that he would vote "yea" on this question, I voted "yea," and will allow my vote to stand as recorded.

Mr. CARTER. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON] and will transfer that to the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

Mr. DUBOIS. I am paired with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]. I do not know how he would vote on this question if present, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. BURROWS. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY].

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] that we transfer our pairs. I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and the Senator from Idaho is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]. We may transfer our pairs and vote if the Senator desires.

Mr. DUBOIS. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. HARRIS. I vote "nay."

Mr. DUBOIS. I vote "nay."

Mr. TELLER (after having voted in the negative). I have voted. I now withdraw my vote and stand paired with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. GEORGE. Has the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. GEORGE. Then I withdraw my vote.

Mr. GORMAN. My colleague [Mr. GIBSON], if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. CARTER. Being advised that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], with whom I paired the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON], would vote the same way that the Senator from Maryland would vote, I wish to withdraw my vote so that the Senator from Colorado in charge of the bill may cast his vote.

Mr. TELLER. I vote "nay."

Mr. GEORGE. I am assured by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] is absent unpaired, and would vote "nay." I therefore transfer my pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE] to the Senator from South Dakota, and will let my vote in the negative stand.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 27; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin. I offer an amendment the subject-matter of which has been considered by a standing committee of the body and was unanimously reported by the Military Committee. It is also recommended by the War Department. It will not add to the expense of the Academy, but will improve its discipline.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert after line 22, on page 7, the following:

The President of the United States is authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint a director of gymnastics and instructor in swordsmanship at the United States Military Academy as a first lieutenant of infantry, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of officers of that class.

Mr. TELLER. I think on that amendment I shall have to raise the point of order that it is general legislation.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin. I think there will be no discussion of the amendment, and I trust the Senator will withdraw the point of order. If there is discussion, I shall withdraw the amendment.

Mr. TELLER. I think I shall have to make the point of order on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is well taken and that the amendment is not in order.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the pending order may be informally laid aside in order that we may consider the pension appropriation bill. As I have reason to believe that this bill will occupy very little time, for my own convenience I shall be glad if the Senate will continue in session until it is disposed of.

Mr. CALL. I have no objection to temporarily laying aside the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside, and that the bill the title of which will be stated may be now considered.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 3537) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with, and that the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations may be acted upon as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if he intends to go on with the bill to-night?

Mr. ALLISON. I should prefer to do so, as it is a brief bill and is in accordance with the estimates, and only one or two slight amendments have been reported to it as it came from the House of Representatives. I think it will take but a short time.

Mr. VILAS. I think it will probably lead to debate, and we ought to have a brief executive session.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall consent to that also if we get through with the bill in time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 2, line 9, before the word "whenever," to strike out "during the fiscal year 1897, in expending this appropriation," and insert "that"; so as to make the clause read:

That whenever a claim for pension under the act of June 27, 1890, has been, or shall hereafter, be rejected, suspended, or dismissed, and a new application shall have been, or shall hereafter be, filed, and a pension has been, or shall hereafter be, allowed in such claim, such pension shall date from the time of filing the first application, provided the evidence in the case shall show a pensionable disability to have existed, or to exist, at the time of filing such first application, anything in any law or ruling of the Department to the contrary notwithstanding.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 22, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seven hundred and fifty" and insert "eight hundred"; so as to read:

For fees and expenses of examining surgeons for services rendered within the fiscal year 1897, $800,000. And each member of each examining board shall, as now authorized by law, receive the sum of $2 for the examination of each applicant whenever five or a less number shall be examined on any one day, and $1 for the examination of each additional applicant on such day.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, to increase the appropriation for rents for pension agencies from $23,070 to $25,830.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the bill is passed I simply desire to occupy the attention of the Senate for a moment.

Had it not been for the fact that the Committee on Appropriations complained, and I think very justly, that appropriation bills were loaded down with amendments submitted by Senators during the consideration of those bills, I should have offered several amendments to this bill covering matters which I think ought to become law as speedily as possible; but in deference to the committee, and I think the sentiment that is prevailing in the Senate at the present time, I have withheld those amendments.

If I had supposed, Mr. President, that it would have done any good, I should have indulged in some observations by way of criticism of the administration of certain pension laws by the present Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions. I believe there are very great abuses in the Pension Bureau to-day. I think the Bureau means well, but the regulations are calculated to do injustice to worthy claimants under the laws of the United States. I have satisfied myself that such criticisms could do no good; that they would not change the regulations of the Bureau, and they certainly would not amend the laws; and for that reason I have felt it my duty to withhold such criticisms and to permit this bill to pass without any discussion.

That is all I care to say.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator from New Hampshire has refrained from offering additional legislation on this bill. I think the only legislative provision in it is on page 2, which requires that hereafter whenever a claim for pension under the act of 1890 shall be rejected, suspended, or dismissed on account of any informality and a new application is made, the pension shall date from the filing of the first application. How much that provision will take from the Treasury I do not know.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator will observe that in that clause there is a provision that the evidence in the case must show a pensionable disability to have existed from the time of the first application.

Mr. GORMAN. Still the provision is intended to correct one of the rulings of the Department, which may have been wrong or may have been right; and how much is involved in that provision I do not know.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I think it will be a very small amount. It certainly can not be a large one. There are few such cases; I think only a few; and it has seemed to some of us who take an interest in this matter of pensions that it is a very great injustice, and if the disability is shown under the act of June 27, 1890, to have existed at the time of the first application, that application should be treated as all other applications are under the other laws. It will amount to but a trifle.

Mr. GORMAN. It seems to be conceded that this provision is right, and otherwise I believe the bill is free from legislation, and I trust it will ever be kept free from legislation. The fact that this bill, which has been read here in the last five minutes and which the Senate will probably pass in five minutes more, contains an appropriation of $142,000,000 or $143,000,000, in round numbers, shows the rapidity with which we can dispose of the public funds.

When the act of 1890 was under consideration, I took it upon myself to discuss that act very thoroughly, or as thoroughly as I could, showing by the estimates that were made at the time that the expenditures of the Government on this account would reach from $165,000,000 to $175,000,000 per annum for a certain period. The expenditures did reach about $160,000,000 under the operation of the law; but under the strict construction placed upon the law by the last two Commissioners of Pensions, both of whom, I believe, served in the Union Army, these amounts have been cut down, unjustly, possibly, in many cases, but still there remains this budget of some $140,000,000. I stated at that time that under the operation of the McKinley revenue law, then in force, unquestionably the revenues of the Government would have to be increased or there would be a deficiency in the Treasury. It has so operated, and it hangs to-day over the Treasury like a pall; it can not be removed; it can not be lessened.

Mr. HAWLEY. Why not?

Mr. GORMAN. It will only be lessened as time passes on.

Mr. HAWLEY. Why can not the deficiency be provided for?

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator's friends have possession of the only power in the Government——

Mr. HAWLEY. Without a vote of the Democratic party to help us.

Mr. GORMAN. We can collect sufficient revenue. That question, however, I do not propose to discuss at this time. We shall reach it later, when the Senator from Connecticut with his party and his allies shall have presented the revenue bill, which I trust will be very soon. But, Mr. President, there stands the pension law. It can not be modified; it can not be repealed; the amount of the appropriations can not be reduced except by the administration of the Department; and it is here to swell up the appropriations of every Congress to half a billion dollars per annum.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a single word. I have no disposition to discuss the questions raised by the Senator from Maryland. If this pension appropriation bill be a pall that hangs over the Congress and the country, I for one am glad that it hangs over the Congress and the country. I believe we ought to provide very generously for the men who saved the Union.

I want to call the attention of the Senator from Maryland to the fact that there is, as I conceive, one other item of new legislation on this bill, and that is contained in the proviso in lines 11, 12, and 13, on page 3:

Provided, That the report of such examining surgeons shall specifically state the rating which, in their judgment, the applicant is entitled to.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think during the entire period of the administration of the pension laws in this country, until very recently, possibly until two years ago, the examining boards were required to state on their ratings what, in their judgment, they found the soldier entitled to, so that if a Representative or a Senator went to the Pension Bureau to examine the papers he could ascertain specifically what the opinion of the surgeons who made the personal examination of the soldier was as to the amount which, in their judgment, he was entitled to receive under the law. For some reason or other the Pension Bureau saw fit, a couple of years ago, I think, to instruct the medical examining board that they should not make any ratings at all; that they should simply state the physical or mental disabilities they found the soldier to be suffering from. The result is that if a man in public life, trying to serve his constituents, goes to the Pension Bureau and examines those papers, he is utterly in the dark as to the opinion of the medical examining boards or the surgeons detailed to make an examination as to what the rating ought to be.

On the last appropriation bill I offered an amendment, which was adopted by the Senate, in precisely those words, but it was dropped out in conference. I am very glad to find it in this bill, because I think that we ought to insist that the custom which had been followed for so many years, which so helped to a correct understanding of the rates of pension, ought to be insisted upon, and that the Bureau should return to that very proper custom, which for some reason or other was discontinued.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to the fact that the amendment offered by him last year was retained. It is in the law of the current year.

Mr. GALLINGER. I had overlooked that. From the fact that it is in this bill I supposed it had been then dropped out.

Mr. ALLISON. It has not been dropped out. It has been carried into the present bill in the same phraseology as in the existing law.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very glad to hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 18, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

KANSAS CITY, FORT SCOTT AND MEMPHIS RAILROAD.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5382) to authorize the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Memphis Railroad Company to extend its line of railroad into the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Memphis Railroad Company be, and the same is hereby, authorized and empowered to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad and telegraph line from a point on the south line of the State of Kansas near the city of Baxter Springs to the town of Miami, in the Indian Territory: Provided, That work shall be commenced on such construction within a reasonable time from the approval of this act, and completed so as to have trains running to the town of Miami within twelve months from said date.

SEC. 2. That before said company shall enter the territory of any nation or tribe of Indians for the purpose of constructing its line of railroad and telegraph it shall have the written consent of the general council of such tribe thereto, which shall be filed with the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 3. That said company shall have authority to acquire a right of way for its line of railroad and telegraph from individual allottees upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon between the parties, and in cases where the l ne of said railroad runs through the lands of minor allottees the judge of the United States court for the district wherein said lands are situated shall have power to regulate the manner, terms, and conditions whereby such right of way shall be acquired.

SEC. 4. That in cases where a right of way can not be acquired from adult allottees by agreement between the parties, the same may be acquired by proceedings in condemnation in the United States court for the proper district, or before the judge thereof in vacation, according to the provisions of chapter 58 of Sanders and Hill's Digest of the Laws of Arkansas, 1894, respecting "eminent domain," so far as the same can be made applicable.

The Committee on Indian Affairs recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

Add to the bill:

"Provided, That in addition to the compensation herein provided for said railroad company shall pay to the Secretary of the Interior, for the benefit of the tribes through whose lands the said railroad may be constructed, the sum of $50 per mile for each mile of road constructed through tribal lands which have not been allotted to individual Indians. Said company shall also pay, so long as said lands are owned and occupied as tribal property, to the Secretary of the Interior, the sum of $15 per annum for each mile of railway it shall construct through the said Territory. And the money paid the Secretary of the Interior under the provisions of this act shall be apportioned by him among the several tribes in accordance with the number of miles of road that may be constructed through each reservation: Provided further, That Congress shall have the right, so long as said lands remain as tribal property, to impose such additional taxes upon said railroads as may be deemed just and proper for their benefit, and the like power may be exercised by any State or Territory which may hereafter be formed."

There being no objection, the bill was considered, the amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS of Kansas, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FORT KLAMATH HAY RESERVATION.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5286) providing for the disposal of lands lying within the Fort Klamath Hay Reservation not included in the Klamath Indian Reservation, in Oregon.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all lands lying within the boundaries of the Fort Klamath Hay Reservation, not included in the Klamath Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon, shall be open to the operation of the laws regulating homestead entry: Provided, That the disposal of said lands shall be made in tracts not exceeding 80 acres to any one bona fide settler thereon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Reserving the right to object, let us have the report read to see what the nature of the case is.

The report (by Mr. ELLIS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5286) for disposal of Fort Klamath hay reserve, submit the following report:

The body of land sought to be restored to the public domain by this bill consists of about 2,000 acres. It was originally set apart as a hay reserve for the use of the United States military post at Fort Klamath, Oreg., which fort has long since been abandoned and the post vacated. The land embraced within the reserve has been transferred from the jurisdiction of the War Department to that of the Department of the Interior. Under existing law the land is not subject to homestead entry.

It being desirable that occupation by bona fide settlers shall be encouraged as to said lands, and in consideration of the fact that the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under date of January 23, 1895, recommended as follows:

"After further consideration of the subject, and influenced by a wish to secure for actual settlers every possible facility for acquiring homes, I may state * * * that I now amend the report of September 12, 1894, and recommend that the two small reservations under consideration be divided into 40-acre tracts, and that the lands be disposed of under the homestead laws."

Of the two small reservations referred to, the Fort Klamath hay reserve is one.

By the bill reported, which was drafted by the Department, it will be seen that 80 acres is made the limit of homestead entries on said tract instead of 40 acres, and your committee so report, and recommend the passage of the bill without amendment.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill why the recommendation of the Secretary has been disregarded as to the extent of the tracts into which this reservation is supposed to be divided?

Mr. HERMANN. I will state that the Department concluded that 40 acres would be entirely too small a limit to induce settlers to occupy the land, inasmuch as there is a large body of the public land still unoccupied in that region and subject to settlement, and deemed 80 acres to be a sufficient and satisfactory limitation.

Mr. DINGLEY. We are not able to hear the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. HERMANN. I was just answering the gentleman from Tennessee that the Department, which had formerly recommended the distribution of this land in 40-acre tracts, had concluded that 80 acres would be necessary to induce settlers. That is the present recommendation.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman please explain why this reservation does not come under the McRae bill passed in the last Congress?

Mr. HERMANN. It is owing to the fact that the lands have not been surveyed. If they were surveyed they might come under the provisions of that bill and be offered at public sale to the highest bidder. But the Department thought, inasmuch as the body of land is very small in area, that it would be much better to induce settlers rather than offer the land at public sale, and therefore the bill is drawn in its present form to meet that opinion and wish of the Department.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I understood the recommendation of the Department to be that this is to be divided into tracts of 40 acres.

Mr. HERMANN. Yes, two years ago a report was made which embraced 40-acre lots, as suggested by the Department. Since then the Department has concluded that 80 acres would be a proper limitation, and so report.

There is no objection in the Department; it has been carefully considered, is desired by the people in the surrounding country, and meets the unanimous report of the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

F. L. TAYLOR.

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill No. 1889, granting an honorable discharge to F. L. Taylor from December 2, 1864.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to correct the military record of Capt. F. L. Taylor, late of Thirty-fourth New Jersey Volunteers, and to issue to said officer a certificate of honorable discharge as of December 2, 1864.

Mr. MARSH. Is there a report accompanying this?

Mr. STEELE. Let us have the report.

Mr. LOUD. I think that this is one of those bills which should have its consideration in the Friday night session.

Mr. OTEY. It does not come, under the rules of the House, in the class of bills to be so considered. This comes from the Military Committee.

Mr. LOUD. Is it to remove a charge of desertion or to correct a military record?

Mr. OTEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOUD. We consider these bills in the Friday night sessions.

Mr. OTEY. This is not for desertion, for an order of the President reinstated this officer in 1866. He was dismissed because he resigned in December, 1864.

He was a private and served three years in the Army, and was promoted to the position of captain. He is mentioned favorably many times in the Records of the Rebellion, and stood high in the estimation of his officers and among the people in his own State, which is New Jersey. Every member from that State, I believe, knows of him. He belonged to the Thirty-fourth New Jersey. He asked for leave of absence December, 1864, which was declined, and he then asked either to be given leave of absence or a dismissal from the Army.

He was dismissed. Seeing his hasty action, he then asked the President to revoke the order, which the President did. He has stood on the rolls ever since until 1894, drawing a pension of $12 a month. In 1894 the Secretary of the Interior decided that the President had no right to make such an order. This bill is simply ratifying the order of the President of the United States, and I hope no gentleman will object to it. It is not a question of a pension at all.

Mr. LOUD. If this matter can properly come before a Friday night session, I shall object; otherwise not.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman states that it is not a bill to remove a charge of desertion. Bills removing charges of desertion properly come up for consideration at the Friday night session.

Mr. OTEY. This is unanimously reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. STEELE. I have no objection. I do not care for the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. MARSH. Let the report be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. PARKER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1889) granting an honorable discharge to F. L. Taylor from December 2, 1864, have had the same under consideration and respectfully recommend that the same do pass.

This is a bill to correct the military record of Captain Taylor and to issue to him an honorable discharge as of December 2, 1864. He served gallantly as private, sergeant, lieutenant, and captain for nine months in 1862-63 and as captain in 1863-64. While on detached duty he applied for leave of absence (his wife being very ill), and on its refusal asked to resign or be dismissed, and was dismissed. He was still in service and promptly applied to be restored, pleading hasty action on his part and long and meritorious service, and the President revoked the former order and granted an honorable discharge January 29, 1866.

So matters rested till October, 1894, when, on call of the Pension Department, it was decided that the President had no power to revoke the dismissal. His small pension of $12 a month was stopped April, 1895.

The committee are of opinion that the action of the President should be ratified and the disgrace removed from this meritorious officer.

The facts appear in the records hereto annexed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. OTEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

COLUMBIA AND RED MOUNTAIN RAILWAY COMPANY, WASHINGTON.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 259) granting to the Columbia and Red Mountain Railway Company a right of way through the Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be, and is hereby, granted to the Columbia and Red Mountain Railway Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Washington, a right of way to the extent of 100 feet on each side of the center line of said railway across the Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, commencing at a point at or near the Little Dalles on the Columbia River, in Stevens County, in said State, and running thence in a northerly direction by the most feasible route to the international boundary line between the United States and British Columbia, together with all the rights granted to railroads by the act of Congress entitled "An act granting to railroads a right of way through the public lands of the United States," approved March 3, 1875; and for the purposes of this grant and the construction of said railway all the provisions of said act are hereby declared to be applicable thereto to the same extent as though the lands in said reservation were open to settlement and sale.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HYDE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DIFFERENCE OF EXCHANGE BETWEEN GOLD AND SILVER.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be directed to inquire what effect the difference of exchange between gold-standard and silver-standard countries has upon the agricultural and manufacturing industries of the United States, and report by bill or otherwise.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to this inquiry, although it may cause, perhaps, considerable trouble, but it is an interesting question, and I have no objection to entering upon the inquiry.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that this resolution is prompted by the action of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, which in resolutions recently passed called the attention of the country and of Congress to the invasion of manufactured products from Oriental countries, particularly Japan, and called upon Congress to prevent this disastrous competition with American industries.

In California we have felt the effect of various phases of Oriental competition. You all recollect the agitation over the Chinese immigration. At first the opposition of California to Chinese immigration was regarded as a coarse expression of race prejudice. That sentiment was indulged by the higher intelligence of the Pacific Coast at first, and was almost unanimously the sentiment of the East. Gradually the entire country came to the conclusion that race preservation demanded that legislation should be secured that would cut off the ruinous competition of Chinese labor in California and adjoining States. We found there that whatever industry they attacked they absorbed. They attacked the industry of fruit culture and absorbed it. They attacked the industry of cigar making and absorbed it. They attacked the industry of boot and shoe and slipper making and absorbed that. Wherever they attacked an industry they absolutely drove out the competition of American labor.

That coast now finds itself threatened with a new form of Oriental invasion, not the invasion of the laborer from China or Japan, but an invasion of the products of the cheap labor of the latter country. Recently an American firm of high standing in Japan has established an agency in San Francisco and is engaged in selling all the various products of Japanese manufacture. There is scarcely anything that is manufactured in America that is not included in the catalogue of Japanese products—watches, bicycles, rugs, carpets, cotton, woolen, and silk goods, and almost every other form of product. They have been put upon the market at such low prices as to absolutely defy competition from the production of American manufacturers. Bicycles are put down and sold in San Francisco at $12 apiece, and I am told that they are equal to the bicycles made in this country.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman state whether, if this bill should pass the House and go over to the other body, a free silver coinage amendment would be attached to it?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I hope so. [Laughter.] But this is simply a resolution of inquiry, not a bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Nevada that he is now considering this without the consent of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask the privilege of making an opening statement, Mr. Speaker, and by unanimous consent I will proceed.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Let the resolution be read again.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I shall only take a few moments.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the gentleman can proceed.

Mr. STEELE. Let us have the resolution read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution again.

The resolution was again reported.

A MEMBER. That ought to go to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. NEWLANDS. With the consent of the House, I will proceed with my statement. The bicycle is laid down at San Francisco at $12.

Mr. MERCER. Can the gentleman from Nevada assure the House definitely that bicycles are made in Japan now?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am so informed.

Mr. MERCER. I do not think any bicycles are made in Japan at present. In Yokohama there are at least 400 bicycles, or were last June and July, in use; a great many of them in use by Europeans and by Japanese, but I saw no Chinaman riding a bicycle there. Most of the bicycles I saw were of American make. I do not think that any bicycles are made in Japan; but I think, as the gentleman says, they soon will be made there, and they can make them for a song. I met Mr. Butler, a citizen of San Francisco, at Yokohama, with a watch made at Osaka. It was a gold-filled case, and I was told that they were made for about a dollar apiece. The Japanese can make anything, no matter how complex, providing they have an original to copy. As imitators they have no equals and the future has in store for us great danger from Japan, if we do not revise our tariff along Republican lines.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for having stated a part of what I intended to state, but nearly all the newspapers of San Francisco are filled with various items relating to this new invasion, and great apprehension is felt there regarding it. In reference to the bicycle, it is stated by the newspapers to be one of the products of that country which is now being sold in San Francisco; and if the newspapers are to be credited the bicycle is manufactured in Japan for $12 in silver. It is sold in San Francisco for $12 in gold. The seller takes that $12 in gold, turns it into $24 in silver, pays the cost of production, $12 in silver, pays the freight and duty and has a profit of $4 or $5 upon each bicycle. There is the same competition with reference to matches, lamps, hats, brushes, rugs, and other products of that country. The fall in exchange between silver and gold has thus resulted in doubling the efficiency of the cheap labor of silver-standard countries in its competition with the labor of gold-standard countries. We have a tariff wall which in a measure protects us from the cheaper labor of European gold-standard countries, but no tariff wall can be made sufficiently high to keep out the products of silver-standard countries, which, measured in gold, cost only one-half of what they used to. The only relief is to be found in combined tariff and financial legislation, the former raising the tariff wall a little higher and the latter increasing the value of silver by increasing its use, and thus increasing or doubling the labor cost of silver-standard countries, as measured in gold. We are now feeling the competition of European countries. The competition of the Orient is now about to attack our manufactured products, as it has for years attacked our agricultural products. I think the Ways and Means Committee will devise legislation which will deprive that competition of half of its effectiveness.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, is this a request for unanimous consent to address the House or to pass the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I do not object to the passage of the resolution, but there are others who would like to have measures considered.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the RECORD will show that leave was given by the House for the gentleman to make a statement.

Mr. STEELE. I think not.

The SPEAKER. No objection had been made, and question had not been put.

Mr. McMILLIN. It was peculiarly stated; the gentleman asked permission to make a statement. I believe the Chair did not put it, but the gentleman said, "If there is no objection, I will proceed with my statement." I think the RECORD will justify my statement.

Mr. DINGLEY. As long as there is no objection to the resolution, I submit to the gentleman whether it would not be well that it be immediately passed; and then if there is to be any discussion, it can be had when a report is made. If the gentleman were to proceed, it would very likely call for some reply. I merely make this suggestion, as there is no objection to the inquiry.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not wish to take up the time of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Appropriations will finish the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill during the day. I would be glad, for the purpose of expediting business, to have the unanimous consent of the House that when finished the bill may be reported to the House by handing it to the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois requests permission, instead of reporting the legislative appropriation bill to the House, that the committee may be permitted to report it by handing it to the Clerk.

Mr. CRISP. Points of order being reserved.

The SPEAKER. Points of order being reserved. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported the bill (H. R. 6249) making appropriations for current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CAPT. FRANCIS A. BEUTER.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill that I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 71) for the relief of Capt. Francis A. Beuter.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to correct the muster of Francis A. Beuter, that he be recognized as captain from the 4th day of September, 1863, in the Fourth United States Colored Troops, cavalry.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury pay to the said Francis A. Beuter his pay as captain of cavalry from the 4th day of September, 1863, to the date that he was mustered and paid as captain in the Fourth United States Colored Troops, April, 1864, deducting all payments on account of any other sums heretofore paid.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. This bill has been reported by five Congresses favorably, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, let us have the report read.

The report (by Mr. COOPER of Texas) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 71) for the relief of Capt. Francis A. Beuter, submit the following report:

This claim was presented to the Committee on War Claims of the Fifty-third Congress, and was favorably reported upon by that committee.

A careful investigation of the facts involved brings your committee to the same conclusion as that reached by the committee of the last House. A copy of said report is hereto attached and made a part of this report.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. That simply adopts another report and sheds no light on the question at all. If it is all, I shall have to object.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I ask for the reading of the preceding reports which were adopted.

The preceding reports were read, as follows:

[House Report No. 329, Fifty-third Congress, second session.]

The facts out of which claim arises will be found stated in the House report of the Committee on War Claims of the Fifty-second Congress, which is hereto appended as part of this report.

Your committee adopt the said report as their own, and report back the bill and recommend its passage.

[House Report No. 1984, Fifty-second Congress, first session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2033) for the relief of Capt. Francis A. Beuter, submit the following report:

Your committee adopt the report of the Committee on War Claims of the Fifty-first Congress on this case, a copy being hereto attached, and recommend the passage of the bill.

[House Report No. 230, Fifty-first Congress, first session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5037) for the relief of Capt. Francis A. Beuter, report as follows:

The facts out of which the bill for relief arises will be found stated in House report from the Committee on War Claims of the Fiftieth Congress, a copy of which is hereto annexed for information.

Your committee adopt the said report as their own, and report back the bill and recommend its passage with the following amendment:

In line 6 strike out "first" and insert in lieu thereof "fourth."

[House Report No. 2036, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4893) for the relief of Francis A. Beuter, submit the following report:

This officer claims he was ordered and commissioned by General Banks in 1863, in September, as a captain and recruiting officer; that pursuant to that instruction he went into the Teche country to recruit for the Fourth United States Colored Cavalry, and avers that he did report to General Weitzel, as ordered, and was by him ordered to take 25 recruits to New Orleans the latter part of September, 1863, and while on duty at New Orleans a few days was ordered to proceed to Texas, which he did, and reported to General Washburn; participated in the capture of Fort Esperanza in November, 1863, and was detailed by General Washburn as commissary of subsistence, and served as such until December 25, 1863, and was then sent with General Fitz Henry Warren to Indianola, where he was assigned to duty by General Warren in command of two companies of infantry to act as post commander. In about two weeks he was relieved by two regiments. The duty at Indianola had been very dangerous and difficult to perform. He was then sent in command of 20 scouts to gather the products of the country and provide subsistence for the forces in Texas until March, 1864, when he was ordered to New Orleans as captain in the Fourth Regiment of United States Colored Cavalry, which occurred in the early part of April, and received pay only from about the 8th of April, 1864; that his petition reciting his service, and the fact that he was not mustered until April 8, 1864, is marked Exhibit A.

He files a letter from the War Department, dated May 6, 1876, marked Exhibit B, giving date of muster.

Also copy of letter of Maj. Gen. N. P. Banks, stating that he believes this claimant received a provisional commission in 1863, and served under said commission as alleged; that he was a competent, faithful officer, and deserves consideration; marked Exhibit C.

Also a certificate of G. Weitzel, major of engineers, that this applicant did report to him for duty under a commission from General Banks, for the purpose of recruiting, and shortly was returned to New Orleans; marked Exhibit D.

The affidavit of Capt. A. J. Whittier, late of Washington, showing the identity of the officer making this claim, that he is the identical Franz Beuter who was a captain in the Fourth United States Cavalry. It is marked Exhibit E.

The commission, orders, and other papers referred to in client's petition are lost. He relies upon the five papers, Exhibits A to E, as proof of his allegations.

The report is submitted, recommending the passage of the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, there appears to be nothing in that report as a foundation for this bill except the claimant's own statement of his case. I do not wish to stand in the gentleman's way in having this matter considered, but I will ask him to consent that the bill be held over, and in the meantime I will take occasion to examine the certificates instead of occupying the time of the House by having them read now. The report, it will be observed, seems to be founded exclusively on the man's own statement.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, there is the report of the Secretary of War and the report of General Banks, who employed this man——

The SPEAKER. The statement of the gentleman from Tennessee is equivalent to an objection.

COMMITTEE ON THE POST-OFFICE AND POST-ROADS.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission of the House for the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to sit during the sessions of the House until the Post-Office appropriation bill is completed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The next thing in order is the call of committees. The call rests with the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The Clerk proceeded with the call.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. There were some bills reported favorably by the Committee of the Whole at the last Friday evening session. Would it be in order to have them considered under this call?

The SPEAKER. It would not.

The call of committees was completed.

HARBOR OF MANITOWOC, WIS.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a report from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ask for its present consideration.

The report was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish the House with such information as he may have in his possession as to (first) the plans of the proposed project for the establishment of a channel of the depth of from 20 to 21 feet in the harbor of the city of Manitowoc, in the State of Wisconsin; (second) the approximate cost of such project; and (third) whether the same could not be advantageously adopted as a needed addition to or extension of the existing Government improvements at that harbor.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors, to whom was referred House resolution No. 159, respectfully report that they have had said resolution under consideration, and recommend that the same be amended by inserting the words "Senate and" before the word "House" in the first line of said resolution, and that as so amended said resolution be passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin for the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have some explanation from the gentleman as to whether the adoption of this resolution would not put the House in a position to make a direct appropriation, which would not be permissible under the present law?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It might, Mr. Speaker; but it must go the Senate and be there considered and passed before that result can follow. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors recommend the adoption of this resolution by the House because of the very great importance of this project. The data are now in possession of the War Department. The improvement involves nothing but the extension of the piers. No additional survey is required, and it simply remains for the Government, through the Chief of Engineers of the War Department, to send the data to Congress for its information. I will state further that when the gentleman from California suggested the other day that to obtain this information did not require a joint resolution, he had evidently forgotten the law of 1894, which follows the law of 1892, and requires that no such information as that here called for shall be given except in pursuance of a resolution of Congress, not a resolution of either House alone, but a resolution of Congress. That law has been construed by the War Department—and I do not think it required any special construction—to mean a resolution passed by both Houses.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request for the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, of course the passage of the law to which the gentleman has referred was intended to prevent the very object that he seeks here to attain. The gentleman seeks to bring before Congress a proposition empowering Congress to go beyond the existing law and to appropriate directly for this work. Without the adoption of this resolution he would have to get an order for a survey at this Congress and then wait two years before the work could be proceeded with. Now, there are a great many projects of this general character which are urgent, and if the House makes an exception in this case, possibly there are many others that will stand upon the same footing. Therefore, I assume this to be a dangerous precedent for the House to set. Personally, I shall not object to the consideration of this resolution, my object being merely to present the gravity of the question to the House as it strikes my mind.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the gentleman from California that there are a great many projects of this character that are equally urgent and requiring immediate appropriations.

Mr. LOUD. We have two in my own State.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have heard such claims made before the committee, but I think it is the sense of the committee that only very few of these matters are at all urgent, and it is only the extreme importance of this project that has impressed itself upon the committee and has resulted in a unanimous report for the passage of the resolution at this time.

I do not understand that that law was passed to prevent all measures of this kind from being put on their passage. The law, as I understand, was passed to prevent undue haste in such matters. But if, when a matter of this sort is presented to a committee of either House, it is, in their opinion, of sufficient importance to warrant the immediate passage of the measure, there certainly is no reason why it should not be promptly acted on by the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. LOUD. I will only say that there are two similar projects in my own State which I hope the House will also adopt.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have no doubt that, if they are of equal importance, the committee will decide in their favor.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The House accordingly proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The question being taken on the amendments reported by the committee, they were agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HULL in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5161) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the pending amendment, offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SKINNER].

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 25, page 20, after the word "dollars," insert:
"And it is hereby made mandatory upon the Secretary of Agriculture to make said purchase and distribution as was done in the years prior to 1895."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the proposition which has been offered as an amendment to the amendment just read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars" in line 25, page 20, insert:
"Distribution to be made in the same manner as was done by the previous Secretary of the Department of Agriculture."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment last read is not properly an amendment to the substitute, because it applies only to the distribution of seeds.

Mr. RAY. I did not understand the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment last read is not in any sense an amendment to the substitute, as the substitute applies to the purchase of seeds, while the other proposition relates to their distribution only. The question of the distribution of seeds has not yet been reached. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SKINNER].

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, is another amendment in order at this time, or should it be offered as a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to the substitute is in order.

Mr. RAY. Then I send to the desk an amendment to the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 20, in line 20, strike out "as required by law," and, after the word "dollars," in line 25, insert:
"And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized, empowered, directed, and required to expend the said sum in the purchase, propagation, and distribution of such valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, and is authorized, empowered, directed, and required to expend not less than $130,000 of such sum in the purchase, at public or private sale, of valuable seeds, the best he can obtain, and such as shall be suitable for the respective localities to which the same are to be apportioned, and in which the same are to be distributed as hereafter stated; and such seeds so purchased shall include a variety of vegetable and flower seeds suitable for planting and culture in the various sections of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, if I can have the attention of the committee for a moment I will endeavor to have this matter distinctly understood. I do not understand that there is any difference of opinion among the members of this House on the subject of having seeds purchased and distributed substantially in the manner that has been followed in years gone by. Of course we all understand that the present Secretary of Agriculture is opposed to the purchase and distribution of seeds. It is therefore the purpose of this committee and of the House, as I understand, to adopt such legislation in this bill, or to guard this appropriation of money in such a way, that it shall be mandatory upon the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase these seeds and distribute them.

I have therefore carefully prepared an amendment to this subdivision of the bill, which I have shown some of the best lawyers of the House, and we all agree that if this amendment be adopted it will compel the Secretary of Agriculture to expend this appropriation in the purchase and distribution of bulbs, seeds, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, and that the law will be mandatory and compel him to purchase these seeds, cuttings, etc., at public or private sale, and to purchase and distribute the best he can obtain, and to distribute them, as heretofore, through Members of Congress and Senators, reserving for his own personal distribution one-third.

I think this result is what we all desire. There is nothing indefinite about it. There is nothing in the provision of the amendment that reflects in any manner upon the Secretary of Agriculture. That is not the intention of the proposition. The only purpose and effect will be to make it mandatory upon the Secretary to expend the money appropriated in the purchase and distribution of such seed as he can find, and he may purchase them at private or public sale. The amendment provides that the purchase shall include a variety of vegetable and flower seeds suitable for planting and culture in the various sections of the United States.

I trust the substitute that I have just presented will be adopted, because I feel satisfied, after consultation, as I have already said, with some of the best lawyers of the House, that it will be mandatory upon the Secretary, and will secure to the members of Congress their quota of seed, and secure at the same time to the farmers in the United States what we all desire and what they so much need.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire, if the gentleman will yield to me a moment, to call his attention to a matter which he seems to have overlooked. While I am not opposing his amendment, the section of the Revised Statutes, 527, at present stands in the way. That statute provides definitely how the Secretary of Agriculture shall make the purchase of seeds, bulbs, cuttings, etc. His amendment, as the gentleman stated it, provides that the Secretary shall purchase the best seeds available, etc. Now, he does not repeal section 527 of the Revised Statutes, which reads as follows——

Mr. RAY. I know how it reads, and suppose every member here does.

Mr. RICHARDSON (continuing)—

The purchase and distribution of seed by the Department of Agriculture shall be confined to such seeds as are rare and uncommon to the country.

Now, the gentleman's amendment is inconsistent with the section of the Revised Statutes which defines that he shall purchase rare and uncommon seed, while the amendment provides for the purchase of the best quality of seed. Therefore a Secretary of Agriculture may see fit, if he chooses to do so, to assume this position, that the rare and uncommon seed are the best quality, or might refuse to execute the law because in his judgment the best quality of seed would not be rare or uncommon.

Now, we have got to get rid of those words in the statute by some means. They must evidently be eliminated from the law if we expect to accomplish anything by the amendment proposed here, because this statute provides that the seed shall be limited to rare and uncommon. They may not be, as I have just said, of the best quality. If the gentleman wishes to rid us of that provision he had better move to repeal section 527. It can be repealed, and if the gentleman will offer his amendment either to amend or repeal that section of the statute, I think he will accomplish a good deal in the direction contemplated.

Mr. McRAE. I ask consent to offer an amendment——

Mr. OGDEN. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. RAY. I believe I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAY. I ask unanimous consent to occupy the floor for a moment to hear a question I understand the gentleman desires to ask.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. OGDEN. Do I understand the amendment of the gentleman from New York is to reduce the appropriation from $130,000 to $80,000?

Mr. RAY. Not at all; my amendment does not reduce the appropriation provided in the bill.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I ask consent to have a vote on the amendment that I now present. I admit that it is a change in the existing law and subject to a point of order, but the disposition of the committee appears to be strong to amend the law, and if the amendment can be adopted the paragraph in the bill now under consideration can be easily changed to meet what appears to be the decided wish of both sides of the Chamber.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there are two amendments pending, but the amendment can be read for information.

Mr. McRAE. My object in sending it up is to have it considered prior to the other amendments and not to interfere with them. I ask consent that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the bill by providing that section 527 of the Revised Statutes be amended so that it will read as follows:

"SEC. 527. That purchase and distribution of vegetable seed and flower seed, plants, shrubs, vines, bulbs, and cuttings shall be of the freshest and best obtainable and adapted to general cultivation."

Mr. McRAE. If we can adopt this amendment, then we will have taken the first step to change the original law and will be legislating in this bill with reference to the proposed change, and will have no difficulty by reason of the trouble that grows out of the limitation in the present law, "rare and uncommon seed." What is not "rare and uncommon" to the Department may be to many of our people who want to experiment with varieties not heretofore had by them.

What the people want is seeds that will increase the yield and quality of the products, as well as "rare and uncommon" products—seeds that can be adapted to general use throughout the country and made of benefit to the great body of farmers. We want to excite a spirit of rivalry among our people who till the soil.

I ask consent to have the amendment voted on now, not to interfere with the amendments that have already been offered.

Mr. RAY. If there is no objection to adopting the proposition of the gentleman from Arkansas, I should be pleased to have it done, of course. But it seems to me that there is no necessity for it and it seems to me, further, that the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] is without any particular force for this reason: The amendment which I sent to the Clesk's desk and had read——

Mr. SWANSON. Will the gentleman object to its being read again?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Let me suggest to the gentleman that if the words "improved and valuable seeds," on pages 21 and 22, are left in the bill, the amendment of the gentleman from New York will be worthless. The Secretary can take shelter under that phraseology.

Mr. RAY. The trouble with gentlemen in discussing this amendment is that they have not read it, nor have they listened carefully to the reading of it. I ask your attention for a moment while I read it, so that you can all hear, and then let me make a suggestion. In this Agricultural appropriation bill we make an appropriation of money—$130,000—for the purchase and distribution of seeds, etc. The bill as reported from the Committee on Agriculture says: For the purchase, propagation, and distribution, "as required by law."

Now, those words refer of course to the law now in the Revised Statutes; and if we leave those words in this bill the whole matter, with any amendment that we might make to it, will be referable to the Revised Statutes and controlled by existing law. But we have the right to appropriate money for the purchase of seeds and to direct the purchase and distribution of seeds with the money so appropriated entirely independent of that section of the Revised Statutes to which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] referred.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more in which to explain this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that he be allowed to continue for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAY. Now, the very first proposition contained in my amendment, and which was read from the Clerk's desk, is that we strike out the words "as required by law." Then this appropriation in the Agricultural bill will not be referable at all to the Revised Statutes and will not be controlled by the section referred to.

Mr. SKINNER. Will the striking out of the words "as required by law," in the opinion of the gentleman, repeal section 527 of the Revised Statutes?

Mr. RAY. In effect, so far as this appropriation is concerned, it will repeal it. The amendment will render that section nonapplicable. There is no question about that as a matter of law. This bill will be the latest expression of the legislative will, and will control.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then if you leave the bill as it now stands, with the words "valuable and improved seeds," will not those words nullify your amendment?

Mr. RAY. No. Now, let us look at this amendment offered by me as it reads:

And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and empowered, directed and required, to expend the said sum in the purchase, propagation, and distribution of such valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, and is authorized and empowered, directed and required, to expend not less than the sum of $130,000 in the purchase, at public or private sale, of valuable seeds, the best he can obtain, and such as shall be suitable for the respective localities to which the same are to be apportioned and in which the same are to be distributed as hereinafter stated; and such seeds so purchased shall include a variety of vegetable and flower seeds suitable for planting and culture in the various sections of the United States.

Now, that is an explicit provision of law which goes with and surrounds and controls the appropriation and expenditure of this money, and I assert here that if any executive officer of this Government, be he a Cabinet officer or a lesser officer, should refuse to carry out that provision in the spirit and the letter he would be subject to impeachment. And even the present Secretary of Agriculture would not undertake to defy the expressed will of this Congress. If that amendment is adopted, Mr. Chairman, there will be no reference to existing law heretofore enacted, but this provision and this appropriation of money will stand here as an independent act of Congress, the direction to purchase applying simply to this appropriation and continuing during one year and no more, and the law will be mandatory, and will accomplish, I believe, just what this House desires to accomplish. And, as I stated, before undertaking to submit the amendment to this committee I carefully prepared it and submitted it to the judgment of several of the best lawyers in this House, and they all concurred with me in the opinion that if adopted it would carry out the intent and purpose of this House as expressed upon this floor; that it leaves no possible excuse for the Secretary of Agriculture should he refuse to comply with its provisions. This provision, if adopted, will not be disregarded. It is plain, explicit, and commands the Secretary to purchase and distribute the best seeds he can obtain—"valuable vegetable and flower seeds."

Mr. SKINNER. I believe that the discussion now going on is with respect to my amendment. As I understand, the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] is an amendment to my amendment, and the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] is a substitute for both.

Mr. MCRAE. If the gentleman will allow me, I ask unanimous consent that my amendment be considered and adopted to precede the others. I see nothing inconsistent in mine and the one you offer. One is permanent law and the other is only for one year.

Mr. SKINNER. Mr. Chairman, we are all aiming at the same purpose. We all have the same desire in respect to this matter. What I want to do, if it can be done in a parliamentary way, is to accept the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], and then also to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE], as they are not inconsistent. The amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas repeals section 527, whereas the amendment of the gentleman from New York only does so by implication.

Mr. TRACEY. I desire to inquire if it will be in order to offer a substitute for the pending amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. Not if the proposition of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] is offered as a substitute.

Mr. MCRAE. I should like to have my request submitted to the House. If no one objects that will dispose of that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] to object.

Mr. PICKLER. No; the gentleman from New York does not object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there are two amendments pending to this part of the section, but the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] offers another amendment to another part of the section entirely.

Mr. MCRAE. I ask unanimous consent to submit it. I do not offer it as a substitute. I think we ought to change the general law, and to do this I have asked to have the amendment I offer inserted in the bill as an independent paragraph. I ask the Chair to submit my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the two pending amendments be held in abeyance and his amendment be acted upon. Is there objection?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I object.

Mr. TRACEY. I would like to offer the substitute I hold in my hand, because I feel it reaches the root of the whole trouble.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer his amendment as a substitute for the two amendments?

Mr. TRACEY. I offer it as a substitute for the two amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order then.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," line 25, page 20, add the following:

"And such purchase and distribution by the Department of Agriculture shall include such seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants as are adapted to general cultivation and to promote the general interests of horticulture and agriculture in the United States, and section 527 of the Revised Statutes is hereby modified to that extent."

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say in reference to the substitute that if adopted it simply reaches and will cure the evil beyond question. There seems to be a universal disposition among the members of the House to direct the purchase and distribution of seeds, but section 527 of the Revised Statutes stands in the way and will stand in the way so long as it is neither modified nor repealed. Now, when that language is attached to the provision of the law already in it this section 527 of the Revised Statutes will be modified to that extent. The second clause of that section is already precisely such as the language adopted by this substitute. It only refers to the first clause, which provides that only such seed as are rare and novel shall be included in the purchase of seed. This provides that the seeds, plants, trees, etc., shall all be put upon precisely the same plane; and if the substitute should be adopted there would be no further trouble about the execution of the appropriation. That is all I have to say.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] has presented the most practical amendment that we could possibly get in this bill, and I hope this House will adopt it. The amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas would be pertinent at the end of the paragraph, and would be proper. Of course it would be subject to a point of order; but I hope the gentleman from Arkansas will present his amendment at the end of the paragraph providing that section 527 of the Revised Statutes shall be modified to this extent, and then with that exception I hope the committee will adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MCRAE. I do not care where it comes in, but if the chairman of the committee in charge of this bill makes the point of order against it, of course it can not be adopted. I stated in the beginning that it was subject to the point of order, and if he objects to it of course it is useless to present it.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York covers the case entirely and completely. The trouble with the amendment as offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SKINNER] was that he made it mandatory, but yesterday there was left in it the words "as required by law." Now, the law is at present mandatory upon the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase "rare and uncommon seeds." The Secretary says he is unable to find "rare and uncommon" seeds. He has refused to make purchases this year for this reason. So if you leave those words in there, "as required by law," you may put in any other additional amendment that you see proper and he could ignore it practically by saying that he could not get rare and uncommon seed, so that no amendments would be valuable to secure what this House desires unless that provision "required by law" is eliminated.

Now, an appropriation bill can repeal existing law. It can repeal a general statute. It has been held repeatedly if an appropriation bill and the general statute disagree, the provisions of the appropriation bill are followed as the last act of Congress. If you eliminate "rare and uncommon" and make it mandatory, then the Secretary of Agriculture can not fail to purchase the best seed he can get. So I can not see how this can be held to be objectionable, or rather subject to the point of order, because it is an amendment to carry out an existing purpose, and it has been repeatedly held that wherever an amendment to an appropriation bill carries out a purpose already in progress it is not subject to the point of order. Now I desire, in conclusion, to say that I am earnestly in favor of this appropriation for seeds. I can not conceive of a small appropriation of money that has resulted in more general good to the country.

I know that in my own State, in the counties in my own district, some of the best samples of wheat, of corn, and of vegetables of every kind and description have been obtained from seeds furnished by the Department of Agriculture. Now, if you only get in a county one good quality of wheat, it pays for the entire expenditure incurred in distributing the seed to that county; if you get in one county a good quality of lettuce or onions or any of the vegetables the country is well repaid for the small expense of distributing them. We can not afford to do away with this means of supplying the farmers throughout the country with valuable seeds.

In Virginia we get wheat that has been grown in Missouri and elsewhere, and the transplantation makes it better, and we get clover in the same way. In the same way we get all kinds of vegetable seeds. I repeat, that numerous farmers in my district have told me that the very best qualities of seed wheat, seed corn, seed oats, and seed clover, and vegetables have been obtained through this distribution. The expense of the distribution is comparatively small, and it has resulted in great good, and we can not afford to give it up on account of the expense, because the benefits which accrue from the system far exceed in importance the cost. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this appropriation for the distribution of seeds; I am in favor of compelling the Secretary of Agriculture to make the distribution, and I am not willing that it shall be left to his discretion. I regret that he has, as I think contrary to law, refused to purchase seed for distribution this year. But I am glad to see that this House will not only restore but increase the appropriation for this purpose. The farmers are deserving of every consideration and aid possible at the hands of the lawmaking power. They shall ever receive my aid and support.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. How many amendments are pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There are two amendments and a substitute for the amendments.

Mr. McRAE. Would another amendment be now in order?

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to the substitute would be in order. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] offered an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SKINNER]—not a substitute for it, but an amendment. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TRACEY] has offered a substitute for the two amendments.

Mr. KEM. Mr. Chairman, there has been a great deal of discussion relative to this distribution of seeds, but there is one point which has been overlooked, so far as I am aware, and that is that by the time this bill becomes a law it will be an absolute physical impossibility to distribute these seeds in time for them to be planted this year.

Mr. STEELE. What of it?

Mr. KEM. What of it? Simply that you throw this money away.

Mr. SWANSON. This bill provides for the next fiscal year.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this paragraph be limited to twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, asks unanimous consent that all debate upon the pending paragraph be limited to twenty minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DINGLEY. Before that request is acted upon, Mr. Chairman, I would like to know just what amendments are pending? Some explanation of some of the amendments may be desired.

The CHAIRMAN. There are two amendments pending and one substitute for the two amendments. Is there objection to the request that all debate on this paragraph close in twenty minutes?

Mr. PICKLER. I object.

Mr. DINGLEY. There is an amendment pending to the original text and an amendment to the amendment, and then a substitute for it. Now, is there any amendment offered to the substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. No amendment to the substitute has yet been offered.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I should like to inquire, before consenting to the request to limit the debate, whether any member who has views opposed to the pending proposition can have an opportunity to be heard. Apparently I am the only member who entertains such views, and if I may have a few minutes of the twenty I shall not object to the request to limit debate. I should like to have an opportunity of saying, in a very few words, what I think is the objection to these amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. When the question of limiting debate is determined the gentleman can be recognized.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. It is this: The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SKINNER] offered the original amendment. Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], as I understand, does not propose to amend that amendment, but offers his proposition as a substitute for that amendment. Am I right in that?

Mr. RAY. That is the way I intended it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Because the amendment of the gentleman from New York would not apply to the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina as an amendment, being perfect and complete in itself. I understand that the gentleman from New York offers his proposition as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, because if it be adopted it will take the place of that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand it that way. The Chair understood that the gentleman from New York offered it as an amendment to the amendment, and the Chair asked the Clerk if the two propositions would go together, and the Clerk said they would.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Chair will see if he examines them that they will not.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to report the several amendments pending.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from North Carolina to accept the substitute of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WILLAMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina may accept the substitute of the gentleman from New York.

There was no objection.

Mr. McRAE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer the proposition which I submitted a moment ago as an amendment to the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TRACEY] to the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY].

Mr. OGDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] was offered previous to that of the gentleman from Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. But it was offered to another part of the text.

Mr. McRAE. The gentleman did not offer it as an amendment, because he stated distinctly that it was a substitute. Now, I move the amendment which I had read a while ago as an amendment to the pending amendment as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. That would be in order, but this is the first time the gentleman has offered it in that way.

Mr. PICKLER. Let that amendment be reported.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand it, we have now the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] to which the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] offers an amendment. Is that correct?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, I ask that the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas be reported.

The amendment was read, as follows:

That section 527 of the Revised Statutes be amended so that it will read as follows:

"SEC. 527. That purchase and distribution of vegetable, field, and flower seeds, plants, shrubs, vines, bulbs, and cuttings shall be of the freshest and best obtainable, and adapted to general cultivation."

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, for that I understand the gentleman from Missouri offers a substitute.

Mr. PICKLER. Let us have that substitute reported.

The substitute was read, as follows:

After the word "dollars," in line 25, page 20, add the following: "And such purchase and distribution by the Department of Agriculture shall include such seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants as are adapted to general cultivation and to promote the general interests of horticulture and agriculture in the United States, and section 527 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended to that extent."

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Chairman, while I believe that the language used in the substitute I offered is better than that which has been adopted, yet, since the same result is reached, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent that debate on the pending amendment be limited to twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. WHEELER. I should like to have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the limitation on debate is agreed to.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that some other member of this committee would present the other side of this question. Apparently the amendment of the gentleman from New York and that of the gentleman from Arkansas find favor with this Committee of the Whole. It seems to me that we ought to pause and consider in what direction we are moving. We are attempting to change the long-considered policy of Congress upon very slight grounds indeed. Because the Secretary of Agriculture has not conformed to the ideas of this House with respect to his duty under the law, the House undertakes to change a policy which is the only one under which seeds have ever been distributed by the Congress of the United States.

Up to the present time we have simply distributed what have been called rare and uncommon seeds for the purpose of encouraging agriculture generally, not for the purpose of benefiting any individual farmers. Under the law as it has existed heretofore, the farmer, when he received his seeds from the Government, was an equal partner in the enterprise. He did not receive the seeds as a gratuity or as a matter of charity. He joined in an experiment, the materials for which were furnished him by the action of Congress. He was acting not for his own benefit simply, but for the benefit of the agricultural interests of the whole country.

Now we propose to change this policy. We propose to take ordinary merchantable seeds, such as can be obtained anywhere in any seed store throughout the country, and to distribute them pro rata through the Congressional districts of the country. I believe this is a policy which is wrong and vicious—one which, as a precedent, will open the way to legislation which we shall all regret.

Why, I ask gentlemen of the committee, should we distribute seeds to farmers rather than nets to fishermen, lasts to shoemakers, or tools to the mechanic? This is a first step—a slight one, I agree—in the progress toward mere communism. I believe it ought not to be adopted. See what it leads to. The proposition here is to distribute $130,000 worth of ordinary merchantable seeds to the farmers of the country. That will not give every farmer in the land a share of these seeds.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. MOODY. Certainly.

Mr. PICKLER. Is not the Government now distributing "fish to the fishermen" as seed fish? Have we not a Fish Commission here doing that very thing?

Mr. MOODY. Ah, we are cultivating the fish industry; we are not distributing "fish to the fishermen." The fishermen of the country go out and catch their own fish. The Fish Commission is for the purpose of propagating fish for the benefit of the whole country. So anything which Congress may do to help the propagation of rare and uncommon seeds helps the development of agriculture in this country, and I am in favor of it. But I am not in favor of going further. I do not believe the farmers of this country want such a measure as this. They certainly do not in my own State. They do not want to approach the Government of the United States in the attitude of beggars.

Why, sir, if you make this distribution as proposed, it will necessarily be unequal. There is no possibility of distributing these seeds with any equality throughout the various Congressional districts. They will reach only the favored few. I believe the proposition ought not to pass. I know, as I think members of the House know, that the protest I now undertake to enter will not be of the slightest avail. I do not set up my views against the views of this House by making any point of order. I only ask members to stop and consider in what direction they are going when they undertake to distribute indiscriminately seeds to farmers in our various Congressional districts. For one I enter my protest, unavailing though I know it will be. [Applause.]

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to notify the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] that any seeds are rare which are foreign to the localities where they are to be used.

Mr. MOODY. I hope the gentleman from Alabama will permit me a word. I agree with him in the statement he has just made, and I do not agree with the construction of the law as adopted by the Secretary of Agriculture. But because the Secretary of Agriculture has made a mistake in the performance of his duty there is no reason why this House should initiate a vicious policy of legislation which may end we know not where.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, one reason why, in my judgment, this appropriation is proper, and why I shall vote for an amendment to make it impossible for the farmers of this country to be deprived of an opportunity of improving the culture of their lands and the quality of their crops, is this, that the farmers of this country produce all the wealth of our land. When the farmers prosper the fisherman, let me tell my friend from Massachusetts, gets a good price for his fish; the manufacturer gets a good price for his wares; the merchant collects his debts; the lawyer, the doctor, the minister, and followers of all other vocations are well paid. When the farmer is prosperous, smiling peace and plenty bless all parts of our land.

What has Congress ever done for the farmer? I answer nothing. What have the farmers done for this country and for Congress? I answer everything; and yet every act of national legislation since 1861 has been against the farmer; and those beautiful farm homes, from which sprang nearly all of the great and good men of this country, have ceased to exist and in their place we find the cabin of the laborer toiling for a mere subsistence.

Now they propose to stop the distribution on the part of the Government of the few seeds that heretofore have been given to the farmers, and which costs this great Government only about $100,000, which appropriation has done more than any like sum expended for any other purpose. This distribution of rare seeds has done much to develop and improve the agricultural interests in all parts of the land. It is not local in any sense of the word. It applies to all parts of the country.

All the great men, Mr. Chairman, of our country were reared on the farm. Back in the early history of our Government you will find that all of our great people were farmers. Putnam, Wayne, Stark, Morgan, Lincoln, Greene, Wolf, were all reared on the farm; Grant and Lincoln, in later days, were reared on the farm; Lee and Stonewall Jackson——

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. WHEELER. A very short one.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Did these men come as the outgrowth of the distribution of seed from the Federal Government, or by the exercise of their own intellectual acquirements?

Mr. WHEELER. They came as the outgrowth of wise Democratic legislation for the farmers and all agricultural interests of this country; an advantage they never have had since the Republican party came into power. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that the gentleman, in the course of his remarks on this subject, has used the word "charity," as applied to the farmers of this country. The farmers of our country would spurn that suggestion. After all that Congress has done in the interest of navigation, in the interest of railroads, steamship companies, banks, and for the wealthy of the land, when it is proposed to set aside a little sum and distribute a few seeds to farmers that are not accessible to them, an appropriation that would cost less than 2 cents for each person benefited, the farmers of this country are to be insulted by saying that it is a charity given to them by the Government.

It does not make, I wish to say, a great deal of difference which of the amendments now pending ought to be adopted. One muss be adopted, and we must, before leaving here, frame a law to strong and clear that no future Secretary of Agriculture can go to an Attorney-General and get an opinion which will justify him in declining to execute it. I do not wish to unjustly criticise the Secretary of Agriculture. I believe that he has endeavored to inaugurate wholesome and beneficial reforms and exact rigid economy in his Department. I do not, however, approve all his opinions. I see it stated in an interview published a short time ago that he desires to have the purchasing power of the American dollar the greatest possible—greater than the purchasing power of any other dollar in the world—and that can only mean that he wants to see agricultural products in this country sell for the least possible price. I am opposed to any such doctrine. [Applause.]

Mr. MOODY. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FAIRCHILD].

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I do not wish to be understood as indorsing the attitude of the Secretary of Agriculture in so far as he deems it his province to make law instead of conforming to the law, but when the gentleman from Massachusetts spoke as he did upon this question, I have considered it to be my duty to call the attention of the committee to the fact that in the last two or three days I have received resolutions adopted by farmers of my district protesting against this indiscriminate use of seed on the part of the Government. The farmers there are organized into a club, and at a meeting recently, about a week ago, discussed this very question, when this resolution of protest, which I now call to the attention of the committee, was the result. Therefore there is at least one district in the United States where the farmers unanimously protest against this indiscriminate use of seed on the part of the United States Government.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? I want to inquire if there were any wholesale seedsmen in that meeting?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. There are no wholesale seedsmen in my district.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask the gentleman in which of the wards of New York City these farmers had this meeting? [Laughter.]

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, I will answer my colleague by stating that my district not only includes more than half of the territory in New York City, but it also includes a very large section of the farming district in Westchester County, and that it was the farmers of that farming section, who are organized into this club, who passed these resolutions of protest.

Mr. SHERMAN. It must have been some farmers who wanted to sell their farms for city lots.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Has the twenty minutes allowed for debate on this amendment expired?

The CHAIRMAN. No; the gentleman has about four minutes remaining.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. I would like to state that my district adjoins the district of the gentleman who last spoke [Mr. FAIRCHILD], and I have just received a very urgent letter from the hat manufacturers there, stating that owing to Democratic legislation on the tariff their workmen have got to go to farming and they want seeds to begin with. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. I simply wish to say on behalf of the committee that we very gladly accept the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] as amended by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE]. That will be perfectly satisfactory and I think will correct the evil.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask the gentleman to yield a minute to me.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think it right and proper to publish the letter of the Attorney-General in which he gave his opinion to the Secretary of Agriculture. I ask permission to print it as a part of my remarks.

There was no objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The following is the letter of inquiry which the Secretary sent to the Attorney-General:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., April 18, 1895.

SIR: An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and approved March 2, 1895, provides, under the head of "Division of Seeds, purchase and distribution of valuable seeds, and for the printing, publication, and distribution of farmers' bulletins: For the purchase, propagation, and distribution, as required by law, of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, etc., $180,000."

Can the Secretary of Agriculture legally purchase any other seeds than those described in section 527 of the Revised Statutes, to wit, seeds "rare and uncommon to the country, or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our country to another," under authority of the act of March 2, 1895?

Would it be proper and lawful for the Secretary of Agriculture, in view of the verbiage of the act of March 2, 1895, and the wording of section 527 of the Revised Statutes, "to advertise for proposals to furnish the Department of Agriculture seeds, bulbs, trees, vines, cuttings, and plants, rare and uncommon to the country, and for such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our country to another," reserving the right to reject any and all bids?

Respectfully, yours, J. STERLING MORTON,
Secretary.

Hon. RICHARD OLNEY,
Attorney-General.

The following is the reply of Attorney-General Olney:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, D. C., April 20, 1895.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge yours of the 18th instant, in which you call my attention to a portion of the act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and approved March 2, 1895, and running as follows: "Division of Seeds, purchase and distribution of valuable seeds, and for the printing, publication, and distribution of farmers' bulletins: For the purchase, propagation, and distribution, as required by law, of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, etc., $130,000."

You make two inquiries, as follows:

"Can the Secretary of Agriculture legally purchase any other seeds than those described in section 527 of the Revised Statutes, to wit, seeds 'rare and uncommon to the country, or such as can be made more profitable by frequent change from one part of our own country to another,' under authority of the act of March 2, 1895?

"Would it be proper and lawful for the Secretary of Agriculture, in view of the verbiage of the act of March 2, 1895, and the wording of section 527 of the Revised Statutes, to advertise for proposals to furnish the Department of Agriculture seeds, bulbs, trees, vines, cuttings, and plants 'rare and uncommon to the country, and for such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our own country to another,' reserving the right to reject any and all bids?"

1. The seeds purchasable under the act of March 2, 1895, are limited to those described in section 527 of the Revised Statutes, there being no reasonable ground for claiming that the act of March 2, 1895, operates, or was intended to operate, as a repeal of the earlier statute.

2. If not obligatory upon the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase seeds, trees, etc., conformably to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, it is certainly competent for him to make the purchases conformably to said statute, the right to reject any and all bids being reserved. But the form of the question is such that I think it proper to call attention to the fact that while seeds purchased must be such as are "rare and uncommon to the country or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our own country to another," the trees, plants, shrubs, vines, and cuttings to be purchased are such "as are adapted to general cultivation and to promote the general interest of horticulture and agriculture throughout the United States."

Respectfully, yours, RICHARD OLNEY,
Attorney-General.

THE SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE.

Then the Secretary of Agriculture expressed his conclusion in the following words:

No seeds or plants have been purchased by the Secretary of Agriculture during the fiscal year 1896, for the reason that after using the legal method provided in section 3709 of the Revised Statutes for securing the same none were found which came within the requirements of section 527 of the Revised Statutes, which determines the character of the seeds and plants to be so purchased.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Now I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] to the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY].

Mr. RAY. That amendment has been accepted by myself and by the committee.

The amendment of Mr. RAY, as amended by the amendment of Mr. MCRAE, was agreed to.

Mr. PICKLER. I desire to offer another amendment to this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] if his request to limit debate applied simply to the two amendments pending, or to the entire paragraph.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Simply to the two amendments then pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The understanding of the Chair was that all amendments to the paragraph were included in the request.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The request applied only to the amendments then pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will then direct the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] to be reported.

The amendment of Mr. PICKLER was read, as follows:

Strike out the word "thirty," in line 25, page 20, after the word "and," and insert the word "fifty"; so that it will read: "$150,000."

Mr. PICKLER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment ought to prevail. There are 25 or 26 more members in this House now than there were when the sum of $130,000 was adopted as the proper sum for the distribution of seeds among members. I believe it has been developed by debate in the House here that we are almost unanimously in favor of this distribution, and the sum of $150,000 ought to be appropriated, instead of $130,000, in order to give us the proportionate amounts.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PICKLER. I fear the gentleman is not sincere. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, yes, I am.

Mr. PICKLER. Even if we appropriate $150,000, it will give us a less amount of seeds for distribution in the future than there was at the time when this amount was fixed. It will emphasize the proposition that we mean to stand by the farmers in the distribution of these seeds, and I believe our farmer constituents will appreciate that.

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to know of the gentleman from South Dakota if the market price of seeds has not declined as rapidly as the price of silver, and kept pace with the increasing population of the country?

Mr. PICKLER. Well, I believe the gentleman is a member of the Committee on Ways and Means and has full jurisdiction of that question.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, we do not know about it, and we refer to South Dakota for information.

Mr. PICKLER. I believe this amendment ought to carry. I believe each member ought to have as many seeds to distribute now as at any time in the past. It will require this much and more to give it to us.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not think there is any real need for that increase. I think the present amount is ample. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has well said, seeds are a great deal cheaper than they were. The sum of $130,000 has satisfied the wants of this House heretofore, and I do not see any good reason for the increase.

Mr. PICKLER. It has satisfied us like we have been satisfied with a good many other things——

Mr. WADSWORTH. But there are some people who are never satisfied.

Mr. PICKLER (continuing). Because we could not do any better. I think it is cheeseparing. I do not think it can be emphasized too often that, seemingly, Congress always wants to claim something at the expense of the farmers. I am not saying that for buncombe, either. [Laughter.] But it seems to me that there ought not to be objection on every little matter like this, while if it was for building a ship or a gunboat, or for fortification, Congress would not hesitate to appropriate a million dollars; but if it is something that may be of some benefit to the farming community there seems to be an opposition to it. I do not think the chairman of the committee ought to object to this. The gentleman from Massachusetts a few minutes ago thought we ought to do something for fishermen.

Mr. MOODY. Oh, no, indeed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Which fisherman?

Mr. PICKLER. We are propagating fish of new kinds and sending out the best new varieties of fish, and the best food products for fish, to benefit the people who are engaged in that industry, and I say that we ought to give the same advantage to the farmers that you are trying to give to these fishermen.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COLSON. What does the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota provide?

Mr. PICKLER. It increases the appropriation from $130,000 to $150,000.

Mr. COLSON. I was going to offer an amendment to make it $160,000.

The question was taken on the adoption of the amendment; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. OGDEN. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 75, noes 13.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOODY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. I know it displays ignorance, but I should like to ask the Chair whether when it is the purpose of any member to offer an amendment to strike out any portion of the section about to be read should it be done now or at the close of the reading?

The CHAIRMAN. It should be done at the close of the reading. It has not been reported to the House yet. The Clerk will report the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Division of seeds, purchase and distribution of valuable seeds: For the purchase, propagation, and distribution, as required by law, of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, and expense of labor, transportation, paper, twine, gum, printing, postal cards, and all necessary material and repairs for putting up and distributing the same, and to be distributed in localities adapted to their culture, $130,000.

An equal proportion of two-thirds of all seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants shall, upon their request, after due notification by the Secretary of Agriculture that the allotment to their respective districts is ready for distribution, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution among their constituents or be directed and mailed by the Department upon their request; and the person receiving such seeds shall be requested to inform the Department of results of the experiments therewith: Provided, That all seeds, bulbs, plants, and cuttings herein alloted to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution remaining uncalled for on the 1st of May shall be distributed by the Secretary of Agriculture, giving preference to those persons whose names and addresses have been furnished by Senators and Representatives in Congress, and who have not before during the same season been supplied by the Department: And provided also, That the Secretary shall report, as provided in this act, the place, quantity, and price of seeds purchased, and the date of purchase; but nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from sending seeds to those who apply for the same. And the amount herein appropriated shall not be diverted or used for any other purpose but for the purchase, propagation, and distribution of improved and valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants: Provided, however, That the Secretary shall not distribute to any Senator, Representative, or Delegate seeds entirely unfit for the climate and locality he represents, but shall distribute the same so that each member may have seeds of equal value, as near as may be, and the best adapted to the locality he represents: Provided also, That the seeds allotted to the Senators and Representatives for distribution in the districts embraced within the twenty-fifth and tthiry-second parallels of latitude shall be ready for delivery on the 10th day of January or at the earliest practicable time thereafter.

Mr. COUSINS. I offer the following amendment.

Insert, in line 12, page 22, after the word "thereafter," the following:

"Provided also, That no part of the sum appropriated in this bill for seeds shall be available or payable until the sum appropriated for seeds in the act approved March 2, 1895, entitled an act "making appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896" shall have been expended for seeds; And provided further, That no part of the $8,000 for compensation of the Secretary of Agriculture provided for in this bill shall be available or payable, except $25, until the said Secretary shall have expended for seeds the amount appropriated in said act approved March 2, 1895, and shall have purchased and distributed the seeds provided for in said act."

Mr. WADSWORTH. I reserve the point of order on that.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Chairman, of course, I should rather hear the gentleman's point of order before I offer any remarks.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would like to ask if the chairman of the committee made a point of order upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. He reserved the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wanted to reserve it if he had not.

Mr. COUSINS. I should prefer that the gentleman from New York make known his point of order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman want to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. COUSINS. I do not know whether the gentleman desires to be heard or not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not desire to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire a decision?

Mr. COUSINS. If the Chair is ready to decide.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was reserved with the understanding that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture was willing that the gentleman from Iowa should discuss his amendment; but if the gentleman insists upon a decision being made, the Chair is ready to make it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I reserved it for the purpose of allowing the gentleman to make his remarks.

Mr. COUSINS. I do not wish to use this or any other opportunity for the purpose of making remarks if the Chair has already reached a conclusion. On the point of order, I want to hear what it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from New York to raise the point of order that it is new legislation. The Chair would have to hold that it is new legislation, and that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. RAY. If I may be permitted to make the suggestion, I presume that after the gentleman from Iowa shall have concluded his remarks as to the merits of his amendment my colleague from New York, chairman of the committee, will probably withdraw his point of order; and therefore I would suggest that we hear the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I first reserved the point of order, and then the gentleman stated that he was willing that there should be a decision. Now, I will still reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is perfectly willing to consider the point of order reserved, but the gentleman said he desired a decision.

Mr. COUSINS. It is very evident that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture considers the amendments that have been already adopted here as ineffectual to produce the result desired by the committee. It is evident to my mind that the amendments already adopted would not secure to the farmers the seeds which Congress thinks they ought to have.

It is evident to my mind that from the beginning the Secretary started out upon a conspiracy to defeat the law that was passed a year ago. My object in offering this amendment, providing that the amount appropriated in this bill shall not be available until the amount appropriated in the last bill, approved March 2, 1895, has been expended, is to take care that this money shall not be tied up in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture, since it has become apparent to Congress that it can not be safely intrusted to his hands. If you will examine his report made to the Senate, you will find on the first page that $1,610 of the money appropriated by the last Congress for seed has already been used by the Secretary of Agriculture to defeat the appropriation. [Applause.] He constituted a commission, he suborned referees and paid them $500 apiece for the purpose of defeating the legislation which appropriated $140,000 for seeds, and he used $1,610 of that same money to defeat that legislation and the objects thereof.

The Secretary shows that in his own report. So far as this talk is concerned about not being able to procure new and rare varieties of seeds, the testimony of the Secretary of Agriculture himself is the very best evidence in the world that this system of seed distribution has been highly beneficial; because if, within the very short period that it has been in operation, we have reached such a splendid state of advancement that there is absolutely no new or rare variety of seeds to be found that can be advantageously distributed from one part of the country to another; if within so short a period the system has produced such splendid results, certainly, as I have said, the testimony of the Secretary to that fact is the very best evidence of the advantages of the system of seed distribution. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, we find in the letters addressed to him in answer to his circular inviting proposals that all but three of them do offer to furnish new and rare varieties. We find in letters addressed to the Secretary as early as July last some of the greatest seed houses of the country offering, and specifying in detail, the kinds of new and rare seeds that they can furnish; and we find, also, that while that correspondence was in progress, while the negotiations were still going on, this suborned and corrupted commission of his, upon which he spent $1,600 of the money appropriated by Congress for the purchase of seeds, were replying to individual correspondents that "there will be no seed distributed this year."

They let the cat out of the bag before the time arrived for them to do so, showing that they had been instructed by the Secretary of Agriculture that whatever propositions might be made, whatever detailed and specified statements and offers of new and rare kinds of seeds might be furnished, all of these proposals were to be held by the commission as not meeting the requirements of the Secretary's circular; and when he was informed that the seeds which he asked for had not yet ripened and that it would require at least a month longer to get them in a condition to be furnished, his corrupted and suborned commission answered the gentleman proposing to furnish those seeds that there would be "no distribution of seeds this year."

Thus it appears that after the Congress of the United States has directed the purchase and distribution of seeds and has appropriated the money therefor, and after the President of the United States has indorsed that law and that appropriation, along comes a mere Secretary of Agriculture and, by the grossest usurpation known in recent times to the annals of official violence, annuls the law. This servant of the people takes the great Government of Washington and Hamilton, the House and the Senate, and the "strong" President in his lap, reads them a lecture on the subject of their own particular business, then pats the House of Representatives on the head, strokes the gray beard of the Senate, scowls at the President, and says: "My children, you shall not have any seeds in this year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-six, not if the Secretary of Agriculture knows himself." [Great laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, my object is to secure that which we are entitled to. The attitude of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture leads me to believe that he thinks that the amendments already adopted will not attain that object, and I do not think they will.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I do not admit the correctness of the gentleman's statement, and I do not see on what ground he bases it. I am perfectly satisfied with the amendment offered by my colleague from New York [Mr. RAY] as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE], and I believe that it will accomplish the desired result.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

By unanimous consent, the time of Mr. COUSINS was extended five minutes.

Mr. COUSINS. I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture if he will not withdraw his point of order against this amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, sir; I will not.

Mr. COUSINS. Then I understand that the chairman of the committee wants the Secretary of Agriculture to keep on drawing his salary while he is violating a law of Congress. I do not think the gentleman's point of order against my amendment is good. The amendment that I have offered reduces the salary of the Secretary, and it has always been held to be in order to offer, on an appropriation bill, an amendment which reduces the salary of a public officer. It was one of the rules of Congress that any amendment to an appropriation bill reducing the salary of a public employee was in order.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the rule of the last Congress, but not of this.

Mr. COUSINS. But there is no rule against it in this Congress, and it has been the common law of all Congresses.

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. COUSINS. There has never been any rule against that position. Rule XXI of the last Congress was merely an embodiment of all previous rules on this subject. There has never been a different rule in any Congress. There is no different rule in this Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks there is.

Mr. COUSINS. If there is I should have been very glad to hear the gentleman cite the rule. I do not think there is any different rule.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I rise to a point of order. Has the Chair ruled on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair ruled, but has consented to hear the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then there is nothing before the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COUSINS. This does not change the salary of the Secretary of Agriculture. It merely regulates the expenditure of an appropriation which is being made in this bill. The law provides what the salary of the Secretary of Agriculture shall be just as it provides what my salary shall be; but it does not provide when the money shall be available. This amendment merely pertains to and regulates an appropriation which is carried by this bill. It changes no existing law, none whatever. It does not propose to reduce or to increase the salary of this officer; it merely says the appropriation shall not be available or payable until the officer has complied with the law of this Congress. That certainly seems to me to be in accordance with the rules of order pertaining to the pertinency and germaneness of amendments. The amendment merely delays the operation of the bill so far as this appropriation is concerned until such time as this officer has complied with the law. I repeat, it does not change existing law.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Why does it not change existing law? The present law provides that the salary of the Secretary of Agriculture shall be payable monthly. This amendment provides that it shall be paid when he does a certain thing. That is a change of existing law.

Mr. COUSINS. The amendment does not undertake to say when his salary shall be paid. This bill carries an appropriation to pay this salary, and the amendment proposes to regulate the expenditure of that appropriation. I will ask the gentleman whether, if the bill did not contain an appropriation for this salary, it would fail by reason of being a change of existing law? Would the bill be invalid because it did not provide for the salary which the law gives this officer?

Mr. LACEY. There is one point which perhaps the gentleman has not sufficiently considered. Of course he is aware that last August, when the English Parliament stopped £100 of the salary of their secretary of war because he had not spent the money which had been appropriated for cartridges, the ministry at once resigned. Does not the gentleman fear that some such result might follow the passage of this amendment? [Laughter.]

Mr. COUSINS. And that was in a kingdom, too. We are living under a republican form of government. It has always been supposed that our form of government consisted of three departments, the legislative, the executive, and the judicial; but we know now that it consists of the legislative, the executive, the judicial, and the Secretary of Agriculture, who supervises and looks over matters of legislation and determines what shall be effectual in the end. At present this is not a government "of the people, by the people, and for the people"; it is evidently a government of J. Pierpont Morgan and J. Sterling Morton. That is the way it looks. [Laughter and applause.]

Sir, when some citizen of the United States may undertake hereafter to violate some law of this Government, and we have on record this performance of one of the heads of Departments violating this law of Congress, and asking, as he did in the Post of February 9, that he be impeached—defying Congress to impeach him—what will be the answer of this humble citizen when you undertake to compel him to obey the law of your country?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should like to know why the gentleman, in enumerating——

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to know what question is pending before the Committee of the Whole—whether it is the question of order, or whether it is the amendment on its merits?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I wish to know why the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COUSINS], in enumerating the different departments of this Government, omits as part of the organization the gentleman from Ohio who is now acting as Comptroller of the Treasury, Mr. Bowler? [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is there an amendment pending, or a point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was reserved. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COUSINS] has not exhausted the second five minutes to which he was entitled by the consent of the committee.

Mr. COUSINS. I have finished, Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, and reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Now I renew the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that this is clearly out of order, and will, for the information of the House, ask the Clerk to read the clause of the rule bearing upon the subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is therefore constrained to hold, under this rule, that the amendment is not in order.

There is a decision in the Fifty-first Congress covering precisely the same point. This amendment would, if adopted, change a salary, payable monthly, and make it contingent on the beneficiary doing something or refraining from doing something, and therefore the Chair holds that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the first seven lines and the first two words of the eighth line on page 21; and beginning with the word "provided" on page 21, line 10, down to and including the word "Department" in line 18, page 21; and beginning with the word "provided" in line 2, page 22, to and including the word "after" on page 22, line 12.

Mr. PICKLER. On that amendment I reserve the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I make the point of order upon it.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, I will state briefly——

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Mississippi has made a point of order upon the proposed amendment.

Mr. MOODY. If I can have about three minutes, then I am perfectly content that the committee should take a vote on the amendment or reject it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, there is not a man in this House who desires less than myself to seem discourteous to anybody. But we are spending a great deal of valuable time over this bill.

Mr. PICKLER. It is a very important bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is a very important bill, and for that reason we ought to be spending the time on those things that are pertinent, and not on those things that are out of order. We ought to be considering the bill where we can hope to accomplish some good, and I feel compelled to insist on the point of order.

Mr. MOODY. Very well, Mr. Chairman; I desire to be heard for a few moments on the point of order.

In order to present the case clearly to the Chair, I think I ought to explain to the committee and to the Chair precisely the effect the amendment would have if adopted.

This amendment, as you have observed, strikes out from the opening paragraph of the provision under consideration all that part of it which provides for the distribution of any of the seeds authorized to be distributed under the bill by Senators and members of the House of Representatives, and leaves the distribution of the seeds under the bill to be provided for in the section on the preceding page to be distributed by the Secretary of Agriculture. In other words, it provides that he shall distribute three-thirds of the seeds instead of two-thirds, as the bill now contemplates.

The amendment has one conspicuous merit, or rather a conspicuous difference, from any other amendment that has been presented, to which I ask your attention. I do not think that anybody is in favor of it but myself, but I do want the House to consider it, and I ask the members to take home and consider for further action the suggestions that I shall make.

I was much struck with the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina on yesterday afternoon, that he had not time to answer his mail, filled as it was with requests for the distribution of seeds. Now, we are called here to consider the great questions of public policy pertaining to the Government of this country; questions of financial reform; questions as to what shall constitute the currency of the country; questions of our foreign policy; questions of national defense; international questions, and similar duties that I might enumerate almost without stopping. I say, therefore, that the duty of distributing these seeds, and the duty of distributing the publications of the Government in the shape of books and pamphlets, ought to be in the hands of some officer who has the ability to understandingly and intelligently perform it. I would be unable, I admit, to distribute the seeds intelligently. I doubt if there are many members here who could do so. I shall do the very best I can to get the seeds allotted to me distributed into the hands of those who can use them to the best advantage. But the very best that I can do, or that any member of the committee can do, would be poor, idle, and futile compared with the distribution that could be effected by sending them through some officer of the Government selected for that purpose.

A word more, inasmuch as the committee has done me the honor to listen to the few remarks that I have made, and then I will close. It is upon an entirely different branch of the subject: the distribution of public documents. I came here, as most of you did, no doubt, thinking that the publications of the Government were despicable and of no use to anybody in the world.

I had been in the habit of seeing them thrown into the corners of newspaper offices and into waste baskets. I came here and examined the list of publications, and I found they were publications of the greatest value to the people of this land. The difficulty is with the system of distribution. The man who wants books upon navigation gets books upon agriculture, and the man who wants books upon agriculture gets documents relating to foreign affairs. It has been suggested by those who have charge of the publications of the Government that we ought to change the system and see to it that the benefactions of the Government, whether in the way of seeds or publications, should be so intelligently distributed that the people would get all the good possible from that publication and distribution.

Mr. Chairman, one word more. The difficulty is—it is suggested to me and I do not repeat it to approve it—that the people of this country will look at the action of this committee, believing that they have in mind not so much the cultivation of the soil by the farmers as the cultivation of the farmers by their Congressmen.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MOODY. With great pleasure.

Mr. PICKLER. I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts if a member of Congress does not know, and if it is not his duty to know, the people of his district and their occupations and needs better than any other officer of the Government?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Including the Secretary.

Mr. PICKLER. Yes; including the Secretary.

Mr. MOODY. In my opinion, no. I undertake to know the occupations of the people of my district, and I venture to state that in the distribution of these seeds I shall use just as much care and just as much time as any other member of this House. As a new member I have not very much else to do.

Mr. PICKLER. Has not the gentleman received requests for seeds?

Mr. MOODY. Yes.

Mr. PICKLER. Does not the gentleman respond to those requests?

Mr. MOODY. Yes.

Mr. PICKLER. Seeds which are sent out in response to requests are generally sent where they will do the most good.

Mr. MOODY. So far as they are sent in response to requests there is no trouble, but that does not distribute all the seeds.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say only this: I am not wedded to the present distribution of seeds at all. As a member of the committee, and as a member of the Committee on Agriculture in the last Congress, as members will remember, I attempted to change the distribution of seeds by having them distributed through the agricultural experiment stations of the country. That, however, is not the point under discussion here. It is simply a point of order. It is totally useless to argue the point of order. I merely make the point, and it is self-evident that this striking out of the means of distribution in an appropriation bill is a change of existing law and amenable to the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the amendment is out of order. Are there any further amendments?

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DINGLEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 4321) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; had disagreed to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate amendment numbered 4; had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. COCKRELL as the said conferees on the part of the Senate.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee again resumed its session, Mr. HULL in the chair.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, I have a very slight amendment which I desire to make here, in order to have it conform to the work already done.

The amendment was read, as follows:

From line 25, page 21, and line 1, page 22, strike out the words "improved and."

Mr. RAY. If that is adopted it will read "for the purchase, propagation, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs," and so forth. It will not leave a chance for the Secretary to say that he can not find any improved seeds.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Insert in line 12, page 22, the words:

"Division of Seeds: One chief of division, $2,000; one expert, $1,600; two clerks of class 1, $2,400; one skilled laborer, $1,000; eight employees, at $840 each, who shall in addition to other duties execute the requests of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for the distribution of seeds among their constituents; in all, $13,720."

Mr. WADSWORTH. I offer an amendment to that, which I send to the Clerk's desk. With that amendment, I have no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer it as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; in addition to it.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add the following:

"Payable out of the appropriation for the purchase of rare and valuable seeds."

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I will accept that, and will simply say that this is the provision in the appropriation bill for the year ending June 30, 1896. It is inserted now for the simple reason that without it possibly the Secretary of Agriculture might claim that he had not the material with which to execute the law.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries and expenses, Bureau of Animal Industry: For carrying out the provisions of the act of May 29, 1884, establishing the Bureau of Animal Industry, and of the act of August 30, 1890, providing for an inspection of meats and animals, and also the provisions of the act of March 3, 1891, providing for the inspection of live cattle, hogs, and the carcasses and products thereof which are the subjects of interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes, the sum of $650,000; and the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to use any part of this sum he may deem necessary or expedient, in such manner as he may think best, in the collection of information concerning live stock, dairy, and other animal products, to compile the records of the tests of dairy cows at the Columbian Exposition and prepare the same for permanent preservation, and to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia, tuberculosis, sheep scab, and other diseases of animals, and for this purpose to employ as many persons as he may deem necessary, and to expend any part of this sum in the purchase and destruction of diseased or exposed animals and the quarantine of the same whenever in his judgment it is essential to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia, tuberculosis, or other diseases of animals from one State into another, and for printing and publishing such reports relating to animal industry as he may direct; and the Secretary is hereby authorized to rent a suitable building in the District of Columbia, at an annual rental of not exceeding $1,200, to be used as a laboratory for said Bureau of Animal Industry: Provided, That section 2 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the inspection of live cattle, hogs, and the carcasses and products thereof, which are subjects of interstate commerce, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891, be amended to read as follows:

Mr. PAYNE. I raise the point of order against that provision contained in lines 2, 3, and 4 on page 23:

To compile the records of the tests of dairy cows at the Columbian Exposition and prepare the same for permanent preservation.

That is an appropriation for a purpose not authorized by law and changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the point of order raised by the gentleman from New York. Has the chairman of the committee anything to say on the point of order?

Mr. BRODERICK. I ask to have an amendment read and pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks that the gentleman from New York simply have his point of order reserved.

Mr. BRODERICK. I want my amendment pending while the point of order is being discussed.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not propose to make any further discussion on the point of order.

Mr. BRODERICK. If there is any discussion on the point of order I want my amendment pending.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say something on the point of order.

Mr. BRODERICK. I desire to have my amendment read and pending.

The CHAIRMAN. It will not be in order until the point of order is determined.

Mr. CLARDY. I desire to be heard on the point of order. If you will take this first line with reference to this object you will find that it reads that the—

Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to use any part of this sum he may deem necessary or expedient in such a manner as he may think best, for the collection of information concerning live stock, dairy, and other animal products.

Now, I would like to call attention especially to the fact that this is what the money is appropriated for. This is to compile the record of tests of dairy cows at the Columbian Exposition, and prepare the same for permanent preservation. That is exactly in the line of this paragraph; and does not inject into it any change of law at all. It only enlarges to some extent the scope of this work, and explicitly expresses what it is; so that I deny there is any change of existing law in this case. Another matter, Mr. Chairman: I will say that when this test was made I was at Chicago and know something about this matter and what it cost to make those tests. It does not increase this appropriation a single cent. It does not change the purpose of this paragraph in any particular; it simply seeks to put into permanent form the greatest test that has ever been made in this country or any other country on this particular subject.

It was made carefully by the best chemists that could be obtained in the United States, and it was made under the inspection of a gentleman whom I know well, and I know that there is no fraud, no wrong, or anything improper in these tests. It cost about $100,000 to secure these valuable statistics, and the farmers of this country are entitled to the benefit, which they never can have while there is but a single copy in existence. This only gives the Secretary of Agriculture authority not to print this test, but simply to have it compiled in a form in which it may be reached in the future if it is desirable to have it printed, and where private parties who desire to have it printed may receive it in such a form as it can be usefully employed.

Now, I want to say another thing in this connection, which has been peculiarly pleasing to me. When I came here to this Congress I thought I would be very lonely. I thought there would be very few farmers in this House, and I have been very respectful to these gentlemen all this time because I thought they were great lawyers and great statesmen, men who had not always associated with those who have lived in the country or on the farm and who had not associated with farmers. I have associated with farmers all my life; and I say I am peculiarly gratified to find that these gentlemen are not distinguished lawyers, not gentlemen from cities, and not profound statesmen, but that every single man that I have seen or heard is from the country and is a bona fide farmer. [Laughter.] And I say it is peculiarly gratifying to me to find that is so, and to find that I have so many friends here from the farm who will stand by me in this instance and see that this appropriation is kept in the bill, because it is for the benefit of the farmers and dairymen. I wish to say further that while I am a farmer, raising stock for sale, I am not personally interested in this matter. I am not a dairyman and do not raise dairy cows, but raise another kind of stock for other purposes, and therefore I have no personal interest in the matter to subserve. These are the most valuable statistics made in this country or any other country, and the provision to compile them ought to be kept in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Before the gentleman from Kentucky takes his seat, the Chair would like to ask him the question, Was the test made by the authority of any law of the United States?

Mr. CLARDY. It was made by authority of the law authorizing the World's Fair—by a law of the United States. It was made under the auspices of the World's Fair, but whether there was any special law with reference to it I can not say. That has nothing to do with the question. It certainly is in the line of duties imposed by this paragraph on the Secretary of Agriculture; that is to say, in the collection of information. It shows where he can get this information, which is the most valuable information he can get any place in the world concerning the subject of dairy tests. It specifically states that information is to be obtained concerning live stock, dairy, and other animal products. Now, Mr. Chairman, if this is not exactly in the line of this paragraph I am wholly unable to understand what it means.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is whether the law authorized the compiling of those statistics.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, this is not a new question in this House, although it is a new one on this point of order, so far as I have any recollection. All of this work was done by the board of control of the Centennial Exposition, and it was within the scope of their jurisdiction and clearly came strictly within their proper action under the law of their creation. I presume there can not be any doubt on that subject. I do not care to follow up the other question, for I am not especially interested in it, but there is no doubt that the various boards of the exposition were empowered by the law of their creation to make these examinations and tests and reports, to gather this information and these statistics, and they did so, and I do not think the point that the actual work itself was not done in pursuance of law can by any possibility be maintained.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, the World's Fair was run by a private corporation. That corporation, it is true, was authorized by an act of Congress, but it can not possibly be maintained that every act that that private corporation performed could in any way bind the United States, or that the United States could be required to make appropriations for the various things which that corporation authorized to be done by its numerous committees, subcommittees, and commissions, in whose appointment the United States had nothing whatever to say. This matter came up in the last Congress, and the advocates of it went at it then in a straightforward way by introducing a resolution which was referred first to the Committee on Agriculture and then to the Committee on Printing, to print these very same tests.

The Committee on Printing reported upon that proposition adversely, and from the report it appears that the publication of these dairy tests would cost some $60,000. Not only were there dairy tests made at the World's Fair, but there were competitions as to the different breeds of horses, sheep, hogs, and nearly everything else that the farmer raises. There were also tests in regard to agricultural implements, and, in fact, there were tests in nearly every branch of industry. Now, it can not be said that all these tests and competitions were held in pursuance of any law, or that there is any law which authorizes the publication of such tests.

In regard to this particular test, it appears that while there are seven pure breeds of cattle in the United States, but three of them participated in those tests, for the reason that the jury seemed to have been fixed up in advance, and the rules were fixed up in advance, to favor particular breeds. In consequence of that, the owners of the other breeds kept out of the competition. So valuable was the final report of the commissioners who were appointed by this corporation to supervise the tests, that breeders of Jersey cattle, at their own expense, to the extent of $25,000, provided for the publication and distribution of it. If the simple desire here is to perpetuate the record of those tests in a permanent form, then all that need be done is to ask the Jersey Dairymen's Association for one of those pamphlets and file it away in the archives of the Department of Agriculture.

But, Mr. Chairman, that is not what is sought to be done here. This is simply a covert way of getting Congress to publish the results of those tests, a proposition which the House in the last Congress voted down after half an hour's discussion. It can not be said that there is any law which authorizes such an appropriation as is here proposed, and if there is no such law that is the end of it. If you go in now and put this amendment upon the bill you simply change existing law.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, in addition to what the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has said, I want to add that this matter was reported adversely by the Committee on Printing in the last House, and after a full debate, in which the question was considered on its merits, the House refused to print these tests. In fact these tests were private tests. The Government had nothing to do with them; the Government had nothing to do with conducting that exposition; the Government did not appoint anybody to take part in these tests in the dairying department of the exposition; the Government had nothing to do with the matter; and the object here is simply, as the gentleman from New York has stated, to "boom" one kind of dairy cattle as against the other breeds. As the gentleman from New York has said, there are seven pure breeds in this country, and only three of them participated in these tests. The four others did not take any part, and therefore these tests were not really tests as to the comparative merits of the different breeds of dairy cattle.

Mr. CLARDY. Why did not the other four breeds participate?

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is wholly immaterial. They did not participate, and that fact prevents these tests from being valuable as showing the comparative merits of the different breeds.

Mr. CLARDY. Did they not have an opportunity to participate?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Even if they had participated that would not make the test a public matter. It was something with which the Government had nothing to do. We might as well undertake to print and perpetuate the tests as to fine horses or beeves which were made at that time, or the tests of so many other kinds which were carried on under the authority of the exposition.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I have no interest one way or the other in this question, but the gentleman from Tennessee has put forward as an argument which should govern our action on this occasion the fact that the last House passed unfavorably upon this question. Now, does the gentleman understand that we ought to be either bound or influenced by any action of the last House? [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman should understand that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] first used that argument, and all that I said was in confirmation of his statement.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, I want it understood that I protest at all times against the precedents of the last House being cited as a guide for us. [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to say to the gentleman that he might very well follow some of the examples set by the last House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Possibly, by adjourning. [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. But, Mr. Chairman, there is no reason in the world why the point of order which the gentleman from

New York has made is not good. There is no law authorizing the perpetuation of these records. The whole object is to get them into the hands of the Department of Agriculture, so as to give them some kind of official sanction, by which the breeders of Jersey cattle may obtain some food for their stock. That is all their is in it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I wish simply to state the position assumed by the Committee on Agriculture in reference to this item. It was not the intention of the committee to help "boom" any breed of cattle. We believed that these statistics would be of value to the agricultural interests of the country, and so believing we inserted this provision in the bill, though I am frank to say there was a suspicion that it might be open to a point of order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I wish to ask the gentleman, with all respect, whether the request to the Committee on Agriculture to insert this provision in the bill did not come from the breeders of Jersey cattle?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; I think not. I think it came from one of the experimental stations——

Mr. RICHARDSON. Did it not come from the American Jersey Club?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It came to me personally from one of the chiefs of the State experimental stations. I do not know how it came to other members of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. BRODERICK and Mr. CONNOLLY addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize first the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] and afterwards the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK].

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, the words proposed to be stricken out on this point of order provide for "compiling records of the tests of dairy cows at the Columbian Exposition and to prepare the same for permanent preservation." The object, of course, is to distribute the information as to the result of these dairy tests among the people of this country. The gentleman from New York says that the Columbian Exposition was not carried on by the United States Government. I say in reply that if it had not been for the United States Government and the financial assistance and encouragement which it gave to the Columbian Exposition it never would have been carried on upon the magnificent scale on which it was so successfully conducted.

Now, these dairy tests were provided for by the proper committees of that Columbian Exposition. All the breeders of cattle of the United States were invited to participate in those tests. Why? For the purpose of obtaining authentic information as far as possible as to which was the best breed of dairy cattle in the United States. Was it not important to the people of the country to determine that question? Is the dairy question of so little importance that it may be brushed aside by the question of order raised by the gentleman from New York, who may possibly have no dairy cattle in his district and may be used to living on oleomargarine? [Laughter.]

This is a question of vast importance not only to the State in which I live but to all the States from the Mississippi eastward to the Atlantic Ocean. This is one of the greatest industries of the country, one which is growing constantly. It is quite as important that this question should be understood as that the sheep scab, for instance (the investigation of which is provided for in the same paragraph), should be diagnosed and its remedy distributed to the people. Why not make your point of order upon the compilation of records about sheep scabs? I may say, sir, in passing that if the present tariff law shall continue in force two years longer you will not have any sheep to be affected with the scab, or, I might say, all that you will have will be the scab. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, as to the point of order. The gentleman from New York says there is no law authorizing this publication. I suppose it would be immodest for a new member to presume that he knows anything about what a question of order is in this House or what the law is; but notwithstanding the positive statement made by the gentleman from New York, I advise him that he is mistaken; that there is a law authorizing this very publication. The gentleman may have overlooked it. If he has done so, I will call his attention to it. Section 520 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides:

> There shall be at the seat of Government a Department of Agriculture, the general design and duties of which shall be to acquire and to diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with agriculture, in the most general and comprehensive sense of that word, and to procure, propagate, and distribute among the people new and valuable seeds and plants.

Thus it will be seen that one of the provisions of the law governing the Department of Agriculture requires that Department "to acquire and to diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with agriculture." Apply that test to this question. Is this a useful subject? If it is, has the Department of Agriculture any information—acquired I do not care how? The gentleman may say that the Agricultural Department has not acquired this information; that it has been acquired by a private test at the World's Fair. Yes; but we know that under the law which I have cited the Department of Agriculture acquires information by having professors of veterinary surgery in Canadian colleges write monographs upon diseases of the horse; and those monographs are published by that Department and scattered throughout the United States.

The Department of Agriculture has acquired such information by buying it from a professor of veterinary surgery in a Canadian college. So with many things which the Department does under the law. It buys articles written by professors of colleges. Why? Because they contain useful information to be distributed among the people of the United States. That is the duty of that Department—to diffuse this information. Hence I say that under the law this information, if this House thinks it useful, should be distributed among the people. It is the duty of the Department to do it. It is simply our duty to furnish the money to pay the expenses necessarily incurred in doing it.

The secret of the gentleman's opposition seems to be here—he stated it in his conclusion—that this provision is simply a means by which an attempt is being made to advertise the Jersey cattlemen. He says there are seven different breeds of cattle in this country. Now, sir, the raisers of all those seven breeds were invited to this test at the Columbian Exposition. The representatives of three breeds only responded—the Jersey, the Guernsey, and the Shorthorn.

The Holstein men and the Anglesea men stayed out; all of the three or four other kinds of breeders staid out from the test. Why? If they were satisfied that they could succeed, we all know they would have entered the test, for this information is given and published to the people generally, and shows exactly the merits of the three different breeds who did compete in this test. Now, if these merits can be kept from the public, if the Holstein and Anglesea men, and all of the others, whose interests my friend from New York represents, can smother this report, then the public will be as ignorant in the future as they were before the tests were made as to which is the best breed of dairy cattle.

Coming back now for a while to the question of order pure and simple, I maintain that under the law as it stands this is useful information; it is the duty of the Department to collect and distribute it under the law as it is our duty to appropriate the necessary money if we think it is useful information for the people. It is not fair for the House to join in the interests of the Holstein and Anglesea men and others who want to smother this information and keep it from the people, and I insist, therefore, that the amendment should be held in order just as much as any other part of this whole provision concerning the publication, investigation, and information about pleuro-pneumonia, tuberculosis, sheep scab, and other diseases of animals. There are other qualities about cattle, their meat-producing qualities, their milk-producing qualities, and their uses for the dairy, and other information concerning them which is just as essential to the people as to know about their diseases. [Applause.]

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, as has been said by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], this is not by any means a new proposition in this House. In the last session of Congress the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. Hatch, then the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, introduced a resolution for the publication and distribution of these tests. It was referred to the Committee on Printing. At that time I had the honor to be a member of that committee, and during the time it was pending there, probably six weeks, I received a great number of letters and remonstrances against the publication of the tests, and they were based on the ground, generally, that the tests were not satisfactory to a great majority of the representatives of the dairy and cattle interests in the country.

I do not know how true that statement was. The claim was made, however, that the rules were so executed that no interests were represented except the Jersey cattle breeders and two other interests; that no others could get in, and for that reason the other dairy interests had not competed and had not been considered at all in making these tests.

I do not know how these tests were made, but there was undoubtedly a suspicion among the dairy interest, outside the Jersey interest, that something was unfair about the rules under which the tests were made. But, Mr. Chairman, if these words be stricken out of the bill the law will still authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to publish such information as he collects with reference to all of the subjects named, among them being the dairy interest. I want them stricken out because it is made the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to do a particular thing, giving him discretion in other matters and then directing him to publish this particular matter which the House refused to provide for in a separate bill on another occasion.

It seems to me that this particular interest ought not to be marked out specifically in this matter and special directions given to the Secretary in regard to it. It is a proposition on its face to do something for the dairy interest, when it can at most only satisfy a small portion of this interest. This seems to be new legislation, and I hope it may go out on the point of order. If not, I trust it will be stricken out on the motion I shall submit.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the question of order.

Mr. CLARDY. I would like to be heard for a few minutes before that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Chairman, I have not a Jersey cow in my possession and never owned one in my life, nor had anything to do with the dairy business, and of course I can have no personal interest in this matter. But what I desire to impress upon the committee is this: The gentleman from New York says that there is no law in this country to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to get information from this source; but I say that it is not necessary that there should be a specific law to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to get information from any particular source. He is already authorized to get information from any source that is available. He is authorized, for instance, according to this bill, to get information with reference to live stock. Is not this information with reference to live stock?

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLARDY. Certainly.

Mr. STEELE. Without that clause in the bill it leaves the Secretary of Agriculture to acquire the information that the bill says he may acquire, but by putting it into the bill, does not it compel him to take that information, although he may not consider it desirable? You compel him to do a thing which in other cases is left to his discretion.

Mr. CLARDY. It authorizes him to do it.

Mr. STEELE. It does not need authorization if he thinks it is worthy. You compel him to put in the bill what he would not put in, except you coerce him to do so in the way proposed. To that extent it is a change of existing law. He could have taken it in his last report if he had desired to do so. He did not do so, and now it is proposed to say he must do it in the next report. Therefore it is making new law for the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. CLARDY. My point is, the gentleman assumes that this adds to the expense. It does not do so.

Mr. STEELE. Oh, no; I understand about that.

Mr. CLARDY. It simply authorizes him, not to print or publish these statistics, but simply to compile them and preserve them in such permanent form that they may be printed in the future if it is desirable to do so. The object is not to lose this valuable work, which cost so much. The work is valuable not only to Jersey people, but to everybody who has anything to do with dairying or cheese making, because it shows the chemical composition of milk, butter, and cheese, and how much butter can be made from milk, and a great many things which do not apply specifically to Jersey cattle, but to all kinds of cattle and all kinds of butter and cheese making, and for that reason it ought to be retained. There is nothing in this which changes the law in any particular.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I only wish to take one moment of time. This legislation is not asked for here by the owners of any one breed of cattle. It is not the Jersey interest, as has been intimated, that asks for this legislation. The Chicago dairy tests were made under the direction of scientific men. The rules of the test were broad enough to embrace all breeds of cattle, and were intended to embrace all breeds of cattle. Of course one breed was necessarily the victors. It happened to be the Jerseys; but the request for this legislation did not come from the Jersey people. The request was presented to the committee by the scientific men who conducted the test, by President Goodell, of the Massachusetts Agricultural College; by Professor Scovel, of the Kentucky Agricultural College; by Professor Babcock, of the Iowa Agricultural College, and the compilation of these records is in behalf of the dairy interests of the whole country. There is no extra expense provided for. Possibly the provision may be ruled out upon a point of order, but I regret very much that any man upon this floor should raise that point in a matter of this importance.

Mr. GROW. Has the Chair ruled on this point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule, but if the gentleman desires to be heard of course the Chair will hear him.

Mr. GROW. I had no idea of taking part in this discussion. It seems to me that what was done at the exposition at Chicago has very little to do with this question. By law the Agricultural Department is established for certain purposes. It is to diffuse useful knowledge on the question of agriculture. I do not understand that there is any general law for the distribution or propagation of plants, bulbs, and so forth—that is, there is no law which specifies those particular things. The law establishing the Smithsonian Institution was in pursuance of the will of Mr. Smithson, for the diffusion of useful knowledge among men. If we make an appropriation for it, it appeals to our discretion whether it is knowledge useful to man or not; but not to our power, nor to the constitutional right to legislate upon that subject. Whatever, then, is beneficial and useful to agriculture in our opinion we can appropriate money for; and if we can, it must be in an appropriation bill. I can not quite see how a point of order is good which strikes out an appropriation for the very purpose for which we have established a branch of the Government.

Mr. STEELE. We do appropriate the money, and we leave it to the Secretary as to what shall be considered by him as useful information.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has been willing to allow all the debate that was desired on this subject, because the Chair recognizes the importance of the clause which is sought to be stricken out. This is not simply a question of the Agricultural Department being authorized to acquire useful information, but it is an instruction to the Department to accept tests which have been made without authority of law, not made by any officer appointed by the Government to make the test. It seems to the Chair that there would be no question as to the right of the Agricultural Committee to insert a clause requiring the Department of Agriculture to make dairy tests and publish the results, but this is a different thing, because this language goes further than that and instructs the Department to accept a certain specific test which was made without any authority of law; and it seems to the Chair that in order to do that it would be necessary, first, under the rules of this Congress, for the House and Senate to pass a resolution or bill authorizing and directing the Secretary to accept this as a Government test. The Chair believes the point of order to be well taken.

Mr. NEILL. I desire to submit an amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 23, line 5, amend by inserting, after the words "sheep scab" and before the word "and," the words "glanders or farcy."

Mr. NEILL. Mr. Chairman, I apprehend that among the members of this Congress who have lived in the rural districts and who are acquainted with horses there should be no question as to the propriety of this amendment. I had an experience in this matter myself, or my own people did at home last summer. We had an object lesson in the town in which I live. A disease broke out among the horses which was supposed to be glanders or farcy, a deadly disease that may even be communicated to the human race with fatal effect.

I telegraphed to the Secretary of Agriculture at my own expense and endeavored to get an inspector to go there and to determine as to whether it was glanders. We did not know that it was, but believed it, and a number of valuable animals had to be destroyed and killed as a matter of safety. The Secretary of Agriculture replied that he had no authority; he had no horse inspector. I then telegraphed to the Agricultural College of Arkansas, where they have an experimental station, and I could not get any help there. I got the opinion of the gentleman there in charge whether it was glanders or not. Now, I hope that my friend in charge of this bill will accept this amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The committee has no objection to the amendment, but we think it is covered already.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That section 2 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the inspection of live cattle, hogs, and the carcasses and products thereof, which are subjects of interstate commerce, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall also cause to be made a careful inspection of all live cattle, the meat of which, fresh, salted, canned, corned, packed, cured, or otherwise prepared, is intended for exportation to any foreign country, at such times and places and in such manner as he may think proper, with a view to ascertain whether said cattle are free from disease, and their meat sound and wholesome, and may appoint inspectors, who shall be authorized to give an official certificate clearly stating the condition in which such cattle and meat are found, and no clearance shall be given to any vessel having on board any fresh, salted, canned, corned, or packed beef being the meat of cattle killed after the passage of this act for exportation to and sale in a foreign country from any port in the United States until the owner or shipper shall obtain from an inspector appointed under the provisions of this act a certificate that said cattle were free from disease and that their meat is sound and wholesome."

Also, that section 4 of said act be so amended as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. That said examination shall be made in the manner provided by rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, and after said examination the carcasses and products of all cattle, sheep, and swine found to be free of disease, and wholesome, sound, and fit for human food, shall be marked, stamped, or labeled for identification as may be provided by said rules and regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture. Any person who shall forge, counterfeit, simulate, imitate, falsely represent, or use without authority, or knowingly and wrongfully alter, deface, or destroy any of the marks, stamps, or other devices, provided for in the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, of any such carcasses or their products, or who shall forge, counterfeit, simulate, imitate, falsely represent, or use without authority, or knowingly and wrongfully alter, deface, or destroy, any certificate or stamp provided in said regulations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court."

The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to make such rules and regulations as he may decide to be necessary to prevent the transportation from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or to any foreign country, of the condemned carcasses or parts of carcasses of cattle, sheep, and swine which have been inspected in accordance with the provisions of this act. Any person, company, or corporation owning or operating any such slaughterhouse, abattoir, or meat curing, packing, or canning establishment, or any employee of the same, that shall willfully violate any provision of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished for each offense by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 17, page 23, after the word "industry," all of that page after said word and all of page 24.

The CHAIRMAN. Page 23 has been passed entirely.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. It is the same paragraph right through to the end.

The CHAIRMAN. In section 2 it is.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. It is on page 23, after the word "industry," in line 17, the whole of page 23. You will see what it is if the amendment is read through.

The Clerk read as follows:

All of that page after said word; all of page 24, and all of page 25, and page 26 down to and including the word "court," in line 4 on page 26.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, the reason for offering this amendment is this: That on pages 732 and 733 of volume 28 of the Statutes at Large we have the very identical words in this paragraph already in existing statute. There is nothing whatever, nothing preceding this in the clause under the title of "animal industry" which requires any reenactment of it. The amendment which is here proposed is no amendment whatever. It says that the section "shall be amended to read as follows." It absolutely reads that way now, and consequently there is no cause whatever for this language.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The question was considered a great deal by the Committee on Agriculture, and we decided it was the safer way to leave it, and then there would be no mistake. Now, there is in the language which the gentleman wishes to be stricken out that which can be taken out, but the last part of the bill is the amended statute. The last end of page 25, which he wants stricken out, was on the appropriation bill of last year. It have no objection to striking out all of page 24 and page 25, down to an including line 12, and page 23 after the word "provided." I think that is unnecessary, but I do not agree with the gentleman in regard to the last half of page 25.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, on an examination of this statute, there seems to be no doubt but that this is merely reenacting existing law. I hold the statute in my hand. It is not worth while to read it, except to say that on page 732 of volume 28 of the United States Statutes at Large, commencing with the word "provided" on said page, the law as enacted in 1895, is the language in the bill verbatim, and all the amendment covered in the matter sought to be stricken out by the motion of the gentleman from New Hampshire is the law now.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if that provision of the statute is now an independent law or on an appropriation bill.

Mr. CANNON. It was legislation enacted upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. SAYERS. Is the gentleman satisfied that it is continuing legislation.

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me it is. If I understand anything of the law, there is no question about it, and it covers the full page of this volume of law.

Now, I want to say, while I am speaking about this, that a just criticism made upon our legislation is that it is too voluminous. I think it is a very just criticism. It is expensive, first, to enact; second, to publish, and is a constant annoyance to people who must find out what the law is. When a law is once enacted it does not make it any more binding to enact it again. Now, one other word, and I say it in all kindness touching this bill. After some little examination of it—and possibly the subject that is covered by the bill is responsible as well as the committee that represents it—I want to say in all kindness that, in my judgment, a well-prepared agricultural bill might carry less money than this carries by one-third, and amply care for the public service, if it was properly prepared and administered properly, as other Departments of this Government are administered. I have no hesitation in expressing my belief that the people and the country would get better service than we now get for one-third less money.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the objection it is this, and I ask the careful attention of the committee and of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], because I do not want to misstate his position. The objection is that we have here practically repeated the language of a previous appropriation bill; that is what it comes down to.

Mr. CANNON. No; previous legislation in an appropriation bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well. I still say that is all it amounts to, because "previous legislation in an appropriation bill" of course means the language of a previous appropriation bill, and the point is that this language which we repeat here is not the language of an independent statute, but is the language of a previous appropriation bill. That being the case, the question would arise as to whether this is continuing legislation or not.

Now, I am not going to argue the question whether it is continuing legislation or not, but merely to state two successive Committees of Agriculture of which I have been a member in two successive Houses, counting this one, after due and great deliberation, concluded that it was safer and better not to run any risk of an unfavorable decision upon the question whether this was continuing legislation or was not, not to run any risk of having this Secretary of Agriculture who, as the gentleman from Arkansas said a moment ago, can not find that the language "and other diseases of animals" covers farcy or glanders among horses, so technical is he—that it was better not to run the risk of having him misunderstand the plain intendments of this act, or the risk of a decision that this was not continuing legislation, or the risk of leaving any uncertainty as to this law—these two successive committees, I say, came to the conclusion that rather than run any of these risks, it was better to reproduce the language just as it existed and as it appears in this appropriation bill.

Now, addressing myself not to the point of order, but to this Committee of the Whole, I say that it will not cost the Government of the United States one picayune more to include in the act this language, which safeguards every point, and to follow what the better judgment of committee led it to recommend, than to leave this language out of the act. I understand, of course, that it makes somewhat more printing, but, as a matter of practical fact, as the gentleman from Illinois knows, it would not cost the United States Government one cent more to include this than to omit it. By including it you conserve everything, you save all possible doubt, you run no possible risk, you hurt nobody in any possible manner, and you merely add a little to the length of this act.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Let me ask the gentleman one question. If we reenact this provision, do we not thereby say that it is not continuing legislation, but is merely a yearly matter?

Mr. WILLIAMS. We have done that once already, so that if the gentleman's point be well taken we have already put ourselves in that attitude, because the last Congress reenacted verbatim et literatim this very language, although it then stood on the statute book.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Still, had we not better stop that foolishness?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That may be, but that is a different argument.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that my friend from Mississippi is going on the assumption that it is necessary and practical to make that which is absolutely plain by itself still plainer. The gentleman might make a letter A on a piece of paper and might go to a great deal of trouble to prove that it was a letter A, but after he had submitted pages of proof that it was A, I guess the fact would not be any plainer than it was at the beginning, and this is a proceeding like thereunto.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is just an assumption. The gentleman assumes that the legislation would be plain by itself, which is the very thing I am questioning.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, that the contention of the gentleman from Mississippi is incorrect and that this is not necessary is undoubtedly shown by the fact that in the Supplement to the Revised Statutes all of the independent legislation contained in the appropriation bills heretofore passed is included—not the matters of appropriation, but the independent legislation contained in those bills, exactly such matter as that about which we are now contending.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 46, noes 9; so the amendment was adopted.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Insert after line 4, page 24, after the word "court," the following:

"For the printing and binding of 70,000 copies of the Special Report on Diseases of Cattle and on Cattle Feeding, prepared in the year 1892, under the direction of the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, to be distributed as follows, namely: Twenty thousand copies for the use of the Senate, 40,000 copies for the use of members of the House, and 10,000 copies for the use of the Secretary of Agriculture, $45,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the purpose."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is new legislation.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Chairman, I can discuss the point of order at the same time that I discuss the merits of the question. This is a very meritorious amendment, and I hope the point of order will not prevail against it, and that the amendment will be adopted. I am glad that my friend from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] succeeded in having the bill amended yesterday to provide for the distribution of a reasonable number of copies of the book on the Diseases of the Horse, and I am sorry that the point of order prevailed to-day against the amendment providing for the distribution of the report of the dairy tests made at the World's Fair, so that we shall not be able to distribute that valuable document among our constituents.

This Report on Diseases of Cattle (a copy of which I hold in my hand) was prepared in the year 1892 under the direction of the chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry and under the instructions of the then Secretary of Agriculture—"Uncle Jerry Rusk." It was intended to form a companion volume to the book on the Diseases of the Horse, and was prepared in very much the same form by eminent specialists in the several branches of the pathology of cattle. The letter of transmittal sent by the chief of the Bureau to the Secretary of Agriculture in 1892, and which forms the preface to the published volume, sets forth the purpose of the publication in brief terms:

[Letter of transmittal.]

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY,
Washington, D. C., May 14, 1892.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith a report upon the diseases of cattle, to which has been added a section upon cattle feeding, the whole forming the second volume of the series of reports upon the diseases of the domesticated animals. The large demand for and the great popularity of the Report on the Diseases of the Horse has been an additional reason for adhering as closely as possible to the plan adopted in the preparation of that volume. In preparing the illustrations for the report on diseases of cattle an effort has been made to supplement, as far as possible, the illustrations which appeared in the Report on the Diseases of the Horse, so that the two series would together cover the field of veterinary surgery, which it is important to present to the reader in a graphic manner. On account of the importance of the alimentation as a factor in the maintenance of health and cure of disease, as well as in the profitable management of cattle, a section has been added on cattle feeding, which has been written both from a practical and scientific point of view. This may justly be regarded as the clearest and most succinct presentation of this subject which has ever been published, while it is probably the only article of the kind in which the results of the latest scientific researches have been incorporated.

The writer has seen no reason to change his views, presented in the letter of transmittal accompanying the Report on the Diseases of the Horse, as to the value of such publications to the farmers of the country. On the contrary, many letters have been received testifying that the writers had saved valuable animals by following the advice given in that report. In most of these cases it has been stated that no veterinarian was accessible, and that except for the report the animals would have been without intelligent treatment. In so large a country as ours there must for years to come be many sections in which no skilled veterinarian is located, and, consequently, there must continue to be many demands from stock owners for information of this kind.

It is well, however, to remind the reader who has not made a special study of this subject that it would be absurd for him to conclude that even with the best of books he can treat his animals as well as they could be treated by a properly educated veterinarian. Careful study of the allied sciences and practical experience are as necessary to make a man successful in the treatment of diseased animals as in the case of sick people. The employment of a veterinarian is, therefore, advisable in all cases where a competent one can be obtained. In the many cases, however, where professional examination of the affected animal is out of the question, the reader may feel assured that the treatment here recommended is safe and the best that can be advised for his use.

It is hoped that this volume may have an important influence in bringing about more intelligent and more humane care and treatment of animals in health and disease. To this end the writers of the several sections have been requested to give a brief description of the various organs of the animal body and a statement of their normal functions. This information is essential to a proper understanding of the nature of disease or the principles of treatment. When carefully studied it should do much to prevent the unnecessarily cruel and injurious practices which are still too common in the treatment of sick animals even in our enlightened country.

It is plain from what has just been said that this report has been prepared for the farmer and stock owner rather than for the student or veterinarian. As much practical information as possible has been brought together on the subjects treated, but it has been stated in brief and plain language. Readers desiring a more detailed account of any subject are referred to the various special treaties. Notwithstanding the popular character of this work, there is no doubt that it will be found useful to the veterinarian as well as to the farmer. The preceding volume of the series is found on the shelves of many practitioners, who regard it as the most valuable work in their library, and it is believed that the accompanying report will be equally serviceable.

Very respectfully,

D. E. SALMON,
Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry.

Hon. J. M. RUSK,
Secretary of Agriculture.

Now, if I may have the attention of the Committee of the Whole and of the Chairman, I wish to say that this amendment is intended for one of the very purposes for which the Department of Agriculture was created. I ask the attention of the Chair not only to section 520 of the Revised Statutes, which was quoted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] in debating the question of order on the proposed publication of the World's Fair dairy tests, but also to the following sections under the same title, which I think make it perfectly plain that this publication, as well as the publication of the dairy tests, is an object contemplated and required by existing law, so far as Congress shall authorize appropriations for carrying out that object. Section 520 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

The general design and duties of [the Department of Agriculture] shall be to acquire and to diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with agriculture, in the most general and comprehensive sense of that word, and to procure, propagate, and distribute among the people new and valuable seeds and plants.

Now, in the argument of the point of order as to the publication of the World's Fair dairy tests, the objection was made that those were not official tests, that the information was not official information, and that without a change of existing law the money of the Government could not be spent for the purpose of publishing unofficial information acquired by the Secretary of Agriculture. But I wish to call the attention of the Chair to this additional section of the law creating the Department of Agriculture, section 526, which provides that—

The Secretary of Agriculture shall procure and preserve all information concerning agriculture which he can obtain by means of books and correspondence, and by practical and scientific experiments, accurate records of which experiments shall be kept in his office, by the collection of statistics, and by any other appropriate means within his power.

And section 528 provides that the Commissioner of Agriculture (now the Secretary of Agriculture)— shall make special reports on particular subjects whenever required to do so by the President or either House of Congress, or when he shall think the subject in his charge requires it.

Mr. Chairman, it is plain from the provisions of section 526 that not only can official information, not only can the results of official tests made by employees of the Department of Agriculture, be lawfully published under the existing law by that Department, but that Department can, and if it fulfills the purpose of its organization, ought to, seek information from other sources and publish that information for the benefit of the agricultural community.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Can the Secretary of Agriculture publish one volume without authority of law—that is, any one volume which the gentleman is asking to have published now?

Mr. PITNEY. Can he publish them? Certainly he can. The law authorizes him to do so.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Then why do you want this provision in this bill?

Mr. PITNEY. I want the money provided with which to pay for the publication; that is all.

Mr. NORTHWAY. But you limit the publication. Everything in regard to the publication is limited by law, is it not?

Mr. PITNEY. Limit the publication?

Mr. NORTHWAY. The number of volumes.

Mr. PITNEY. I propose to limit the number of volumes.

Mr. NORTHWAY. And that is new legislation, is it not—legislation in addition to that already on the statute book?

Mr. PITNEY. The limitation has the same relation to existing law that every limitation has which provides that a certain number of books shall be printed or published with a certain amount of money.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey this question: The law has provided for the publication of these volumes—has provided that a certain number shall be published——

Mr. PITNEY. No, sir; I think not.

The CHAIRMAN. Has it not provided that a certain number shall be printed?

Mr. PITNEY. No, I think not. Subject to correction by the Chair, I will state that, as I understand it, the law which authorizes the preparation and publication of this special report on diseases of cattle, like the law authorizing the Special Report on the Diseases of the Horse, is the law by which the Department of Agriculture was created, and which I have already read to the Chair. The publication, that is the distribution, of this special report on the diseases of cattle was done by virtue of a concurrent resolution—not even a joint resolution—a concurrent resolution which has not the force of law, but is merely an agreement between the two Houses. That resolution was passed on the 13th of January, 1893, and is to be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the second session of the Fifty-second Congress, volume 129, page 540.

This concurrent resolution was offered, I think, by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] and reported by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] from the Committee on Printing. It provided—

That there shall be printed and bound of the special report of the Bureau of Animal Industry on the diseases of cattle and cattle feeding 60,000 copies, of which 20,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 40,000 for the use of the House.

The resolution was passed on that date in the House, and ten days later, without any debate, was passed in the Senate. It was then treated as an official direction to the Department of Agriculture to publish the information gathered by the Secretary, information that had been gathered by virtue of the law creating the Department of Agriculture, which commanded that this information be obtained.

Now, the Secretary of Agriculture is already in possession of this information, and under the present law it is made his duty to publish it whenever in his opinion it shall be requisite and when we have made the necessary appropriation to provide for the expense of such publication. That is the only effect of the amendment that I have offered. It simply provides an appropriation to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to publish the information already acquired under the law.

Now, that this is a proper exercise of the functions of the Department admits, I think, of no possible doubt. Take my own district, for instance, in New Jersey. We have a very large number of dairies and of creameries, and also a large number of horse breeders. My constituents raise horses, sheep, and cattle, and from the cattle they produce milk, and in the creameries they produce butter—all after the most improved modern methods, not only for their own benefit, for it is also a public benefit, and is so recognized in the law which creates the Department of Agriculture. The purpose of the law is to develop the best methods of rearing cattle, breeding horses, caring for the cattle and the horses, and the best methods of running the creameries, so that the people may obtain better and cheaper milk and butter, better kinds of cattle, better breeds of horses, and so on. It is therefore a public object, and it is an important one.

Now, inasmuch as the Chair had his attention diverted at the time when I was calling attention to these statutes, I hope the Chair will not rule upon the point of order submitted until he has first read the sections of the Revised Statutes to which I have called attention—the sections creating the Department of Agriculture. The gentlemen who argued the point of order on the dairy-test amendment did not call attention to the section which provides specifically for the publication of other information besides that gained by the Department officials themselves—other information besides that which is official. The law requires that such information shall be published by the Department of Agriculture whenever Congress authorizes the expenditure. Under that law the Secretary may, and if he performs his duty he will, publish that information for the benefit of agriculturists throughout the country.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PITNEY. I do not desire to yield the floor——

Mr. RICHARDSON. I simply wish to say a word on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is still on the floor.

Mr. PITNEY. I should like to have the point of order decided first, if the Chair please.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Tennessee desires to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The point of order, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, must be sustained. As it is now, the resolution is not in order on an appropriation bill.

The eleventh rule of the House, item 49, provides that all proposed legislation or orders touching printing shall be referred to the Joint Committee on Printing on the part of the House. Now, the Joint Committee on Printing on the part of the House has the matter of this amendment now pending before it, and it is not in order for the Committee on Agriculture to take up a question pending before the Committee on Printing over which it has no jurisdiction and undertake to incorporate it upon this appropriation bill.

Mr. PITNEY. Will the gentleman point to the rule to which he has referred?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I said Rule XI, item 49.

Mr. PITNEY. If the Chair will permit me, I have noticed a tendency to-day to run points of order into the ground, and I think this is an instance of it.

Rule XI, a clause of which the gentleman refers to, simply prescribes the jurisdiction of the several committees of the House. The forty-ninth clause of that rule provides that all proposed legislation relating to the examination of accounts and expenditures in the Department of Agriculture shall be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman probably has not the latest revision of the rules. The forty-ninth provision of the rules provides that all proposed legislation or orders touching printing shall be referred to the Joint Committee on Printing on the part of the House.

Mr. PITNEY. It does not say so in the copy of the rules which I have at hand.

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; because the gentleman probably has the copy that was in use before the revision. It simply provides that the Committee on Printing shall deal with all matters of printing on the part of the House.

Mr. PITNEY. But this is not proposed legislation for printing. It is a matter relative to the Department of Agriculture, and properly belongs to the Committee on Agriculture. And it may properly be put in the Agricultural bill by an amendment when the committee's bill is under consideration in Committee of the Whole, as it is now being considered.

The CHAIRMAN. Before any further discussion takes place the Chair will request the Clerk to read the rule which he thinks covers this matter.

The Clerk read as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair that this covers the point which is involved here. This is not work in progress. Does the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] wish to discuss this?

Mr. PICKLER. No. Has the Chair ruled?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule, and believes that the point of order is well taken, under the rule read by the Clerk.

Mr. PICKLER. Did I understand the gentleman from Tennessee to say that the Committee on Printing had decided to favorably report this?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; I did not say that.

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing before the committee.

Mr. PICKLER. I desire to offer an amendment consisting of the proposal of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY] with the addition of the following language:

Provided, That the same shall be paid out of the sum of $650,000 appropriated for salaries and expenses of the Bureau of Animal Industry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from South Dakota to the fact that the Chair has ruled the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey to be out of order. Therefore it is not before the House for amendment.

Mr. PICKLER. But I offer a new amendment, in the language of the gentleman from New Jersey, adding the words, "Provided that the same shall be paid out of the sum of $650,000 appropriated for salaries and expenses of the Bureau of Animal Industry." This is a new proposition.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I make the point that that is new legislation. It does not make any difference whether it comes out of that appropriation or not, it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is raised by the gentleman from New York, and it covers practically the same ground. The proposition is practically the same as that offered by the gentleman from New Jersey. It is not for work already in progress.

Mr. PICKLER. But under this appropriation for the salaries and expenses of the Bureau of Animal Industry various things pertaining to animal industry are described, in one way or another, and this would simply add an item to these provisions for the expenditure of the money. There is no new legislation about it. It is simply placing another item in the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not regard it as a vital question, in the determination of the point of order, that it does not increase the appropriation. The Chair regards the proposition as subject to the point of order.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

WEATHER BUREAU.

Salaries of the Weather Bureau—Office of Chief of Weather Bureau: One Chief of Bureau, $4,500; two professors of meteorology, at $3,000 each, for service in the city of Washington or elsewhere, as the exigencies of the Bureau may demand, $6,000; three professors of meteorology, at $2,500 each, for service in the city of Washington or elsewhere, as the exigencies of the Bureau may demand, $7,500; three forecast officials, at $2,000 each, for service in the city of Washington or elsewhere, as the exigencies of the Bureau may demand, $6,000; one chief clerk, $2,250; three chiefs of division, at $2,000 each, $6,000; three clerks of class 4, $5,400; one assistant chief of division of supplies, $1,600; five clerks, class 3, $8,000; fifteen clerks, class 2, $21,000; twenty-five clerks, class 1, $30,000; fifteen clerks, at $1,000 each, $15,000; one telegraph operator in the city of Washington or elsewhere, as the exigencies of the Bureau may demand, $1,000; six clerks, at $900 each, $5,400; three copyists or typewriters, at $840 each, $2,520; one copyist or typewriter, $720; one chief mechanician, $1,200; one captain of the watch, $1,200; one engineer, $900; one batteryman, $840; four skilled artisans, at $840 each, $3,360; two skilled mechanicians, at $840 each, $1,680; three assistant messengers, at $720 each, $2,160; two firemen, at $720 each, $1,440; three watchmen, at $720 each, $2,160; one carpenter, $840; five laborers, at $660 each, $3,300; eight messengers or laborers, at $600 each, $4,800; five messengers or laborers, at $450 each, $2,250; three charwomen, at $240 each, $720; for temporary employment of messengers and laborers as may be necessary in the office of the Chief of the Weather Bureau, $800; in all, $150,540.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I make the point of order upon so much of the paragraph on page 28 as begins with the word "for" in line 2, and ends with the word "dollars" in the fifth line, upon the ground that that is new legislation.

There certainly is not any law at present existing which provides for the temporary employment of messengers and laborers in the fiscal year beginning on the 1st day of July next, and it certainly is not in continuance of any existing appropriation.

I want to find out how tight this jacket is under which we are laboring. The Chair has ruled that notwithstanding there is a lump appropriation for the publications and expenses of the Department, it can not print a publication that is not already provided for by law. I bow to that decision. It is a little step in advance of anything in that direction that I have ever heard of before, and I want the Chair now to tell me, in his decision, what law there is which provides that next year, in case a contingency shall arise in which some extra help is wanted, the Bureau may employ that extra help. If there is no such law, then this is new legislation, and hence obnoxious to the point of order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. One minute, please. The gentleman's point of order is not well taken. That same item was provided for in the act of March 2, 1895.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Suppose it was?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then it is not new legislation.

Mr. GROSVENOR. These cattle books were provided for, too.

Mr. CANNON. But the gentleman from Ohio should keep this distinction in his mind. There is an independent statute that provides for the Weather Bureau under the Agricultural Department. Now, in carrying out that statute it is perfectly competent to afford sufficient clerical service and messenger service without any change of existing law.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think so; but I want to show the ad absurdum of the position the gentleman has taken here. There is no provision in the law that the Bureau may employ extra help. The gentleman can not put his finger on any such law, and evidently this is a loophole such as has been made use of constantly in that Department, first to turn out a large number of men, and then, under the emergency clause, to put in laborers not provided for in the general statute. There is a law which provides that there may be certain clerks in that Department, certain artificers, and certain skilled laborers, a battery man, and all that sort of thing, but there is nothing in that law which provides that they may make temporary employment of messengers and laborers.

Now, the gentleman from New York has placed himself upon a most remarkable pedestal. He says that because in some former appropriation bill there was this provision, that therefore it is the carrying out of existing law. We have had provision after provision for the publication of these cattle books, and yet the Chair has decided that if there is not a general proposition authorizing these publications they can not be published. So the gentleman plants himself upon the position that he has already repudiated, in advance, on the very basis of the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say a word——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Just one word. As a matter of course, I do not care anything about these temporary messengers, nor do I care how much that Department carries on; it is only as to the bringing of water to the wheel of good government hereafter that I do care. I want to point out that we have provided in this series of decisions for a decision which, in my humble judgment, is erroneous and will have the effect to impair our efficiency as a committee rather than benefit legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say a word in reply to the gentleman, and therefore move to strike out the last word. The principle that covers appropriations of this kind is very plain. The law provides what the publications of the Government and its various Departments shall be. That is a permanently fixed law. It provides for their publication and for their distribution of so many copies of each publication. Now, that runs along the whole public service. Here we refuse to appropriate except that appropriation is necessary to carry out a provision of law.

Gentlemen have seen a representative of the Joint Committee on Printing from time to time rise in his place and move a joint resolution or a concurrent resolution to utilize contingent funds providing for additional copies of a certain matter because the law does not provide for enough. That proceeding is regulated by law. Now, the proposition is, that to publish more copies of any report than the law provides for is the making of new law.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, then, will the gentleman concede, with reference to employees, that having more help than the law provides for is new legislation?

Mr. CANNON. Not at all.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman tell us how having one bound in leather and another bound in muslin has a different effect upon the matter? [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. The principle is not similar. The law provides for the creation of the Weather Bureau. Now, then, when the Weather Bureau is created and placed in the Agricultural Department, the appropriations are in order to enable the Weather Bureau to perform that class of service.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is exactly our position, and that all appropriations necessary to carry out the purposes of the Bureau in sending out useful knowledge are also a part of the work of the Bureau.

Mr. CANNON. I think the gentleman would strengthen his position if he would say he stands on the general-welfare clause in the Constitution. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have no position in it. I only wanted to see the position that you take in it. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Any person who shall knowingly issue or publish any counterfeit weather forecasts or warnings of weather conditions, falsely representing such forecasts or warnings to have been issued or published by the Weather Bureau, United States Signal Service, or other branch of the Government service, or shall display for any purpose other than indicating the official weather forecasts, hurricanes, cold waves, or other special warnings of the United States Weather Bureau, any flag or other device adopted by said Bureau for such purposes, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof, for each offense, be fined in a sum not exceeding $500, or imprisoned not to exceed ninety days, or be both fined and imprisoned, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is new legislation, or else it is a change of existing law. I do not know which and do not care; and secondly, that it is an imperfect provision, and ought to be amended if it is to be retained in the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I concede the point of order. There are three or four lines of new legislation in the section. I do not want to detain the committee about it, although the committee thought it was wise to put it in.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I may possibly withdraw my point of order in a moment, but I shall not be hurried by the gentleman from New York. The enactment is one that no intelligent legislative body would have ever voted for with a full knowledge of its meaning, for under that legislation every officer of the Bureau would have been subject to indictment. [Laughter.] At all events, it makes the innocent publication of a false forecast a criminal offense, without any criminal intent alleged, without any allegation that it was for the purpose of defrauding anybody. I insist on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state the language on which he makes his point of order?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The new legislation commences on page 30, line 6:

Or shall display for any purpose other than indicating the official weather forecasts, hurricanes, cold waves, or other special warnings of the United States Weather Bureau any flag or other device adopted by said Bureau for such purposes shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

Now, if the gentleman raises the point of order it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on so much of it as is stated to be new legislation, and the balance of it ought to be stricken out as immaterial, for if it is already present legislation why should we reenact it? If the other five lines the gentleman speaks of is already the law of the land, why enact it over again? If it is not already the law of the land, then it is new legislation all through.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is the law of the land, and it is a repetition in this bill. There are a great many other items that are simply a repetition of existing law. It was simply part of an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ascertain which language is said to be subject to the point of order as being new legislation. Will the gentleman indicate what the language is?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is to the whole of the paragraph on page 30 down to and including line 13.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order on that that it is new legislation?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes, sir; but I have made it in two propositions. The first, that so much of it as extends to the end of line 5 is already the law of the land, and as to the balance of it, it is new legislation. I make those separate propositions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that language reenacting existing law would not go out on the point of order, but it could be struck out by an amendment. The part of the bill that is new legislation is, of course, subject to the point of order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I concede the point of order against the five lines of new legislation, but not against the remainder.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order as to that part which is new legislation. Does the gentleman from Ohio move, as an amendment, to strike out the remaining part?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not care to do that. I want that repeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next section.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill until he had reached the last paragraph.

Mr. SIMPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to recur to page 16, where I desire to offer an amendment.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the following paragraph, beginning on page 16:

Public-road inquiries: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make inquiries in regard to the system of road management throughout the United States; to make investigations in regard to the best methods of road making; for labor, traveling, and other necessary expenses, and for preparing and publishing bulletins and reports on this subject for distribution, and to enable him to assist the agricultural colleges and experiment stations in disseminating information on this subject, $8,000.

The amendment of Mr. SIMPKINS was read, as follows:

Page 16, line 22, after the words "methods of road making," insert "and the best kinds of road-making materials in the several States."

Mr. WADSWORTH. I accept that amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill and amendments to the House for favorable action.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HULL, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5161) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, had made sundry amendments thereto, and had directed him to report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be adopted, and that the bill do pass.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendments were adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WADSWORTH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring) I return herewith Senate bill 879, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to grant to the Gainesville, McAlester and St. Louis Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory.'"

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 18, 1896.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—VAN HORN VS. TARSNEY.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice to the House that on next Tuesday, as soon after the meeting of the House as is practicable, I shall call up for consideration the contested-election case of Van Horn against Tarsney, from the Fifth Congressional district of the State of Missouri. The report of the majority of the Committee on Elections and the views of the minority have been submitted to the House and printed, so that in the meantime members will have an opportunity of familiarizing themselves with the case. I will add that before making this announcement I have consulted with the minority of the committee.

CORRECTION OF A BILL.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, several days ago the House passed a Senate bill (S. 879) with sundry amendments, in one of which there occurred a verbal error. The bill was sent to the President and subsequently a resolution was adopted requesting him to return it for correction, which he has done. I now ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill was ordered to be read a third time and passed be reconsidered, and, if that be granted, I shall ask consent to correct the error by striking out the word "three," in section 3, and substituting the word "two."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the vote whereby the bill to which he has called attention was ordered to a third reading and passed be reconsidered.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the word "three," in section 3, be stricken out and the word "two" be substituted therefor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill as amended be considered as passed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

NICARAGUA CANAL.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the printing of the report of the Commissioners on the Nicaragua Canal, which was recently sent to the House.

The SPEAKER. The matter which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes; the report is with that committee.

There being no objection to the request that the report be printed, it was so ordered.

SUITS TO VACATE PATENTS UPON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 5474) to provide for the extension of the time within which suits may be brought to vacate and annul patents upon public lands, and for other purposes. This is the bill that the House was considering and which was temporarily laid aside in order to dispose of the Agricultural appropriation bill. It has been read in full, and is now pending upon the amendments submitted by the committee. Perhaps there ought to be some brief explanation of the measure. I will occupy only a moment in refreshing the memory of the House upon the subject.

This bill has been prepared by the Committee on Public Lands in response to the President's message which was laid before the the House on the 17th of January last. A question arose the other day as to the insertion of the proposed amendment to include the Mexican and Spanish grants. I can only say for myself that I did not favor that amendment. A majority of the committee, however, supported it, and it was, therefore, reported to the House. These Spanish and Mexican grants are very ancient; they date back to the earliest recollection of old men now living; many of them had their origin in a past generation. The limitation provided in the act of 1891 will, if not interfered with, become absolute on the 3d day of next March. Speaking only for myself, I have no objection to the modification of that part of the bill, so as to include railroad and wagon-road grants only, omitting the proposed provision in regard to Mexican and Spanish grants. Some member of the committee who favored this proposed amendment would perhaps like to be heard on the other side of the question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to state the reasons why I do not favor this bill in the form in which it is before the House. I am one of the members of the committee who have joined in filing a minority report. I am in favor of extending the time allowed the Government for forfeiting these public-land grants, but I do not favor the report of the majority of the committee. While I prefer the bill as reported by the majority to no legislation at all, my views are represented by a substitute which the minority of the committee have offered, and which simply repeals the statute of limitations passed in reference to these lands and fixes no time of limitation. Let me state my reason for preferring no limitation to an extension of the present limitation of five years.

The Government of the United States can act only by and through its agents. Those agents are appointed at different times, usually changing office with each new Administration. They can not always keep themselves fully advised as to the public business, nor can they watch the interests of the United States as an individual can watch and protect his interests. Matters of grave importance with reference to these public lands may escape the attention of agents who have recently come into office. I know of no limitation that has ever been adopted by any State on any question except on the assumption that by reason of lapse of time the presumption had arisen that the title was perfected or the claim vested in the party exercising the right thereto.

Now, we know that to-day the Government of the United States claims that a large amount of these public-land grants should be forfeited, that the railroad companies to whom they were made have received, either through mistake or fraud, a large quantity of public lands to which they were not entitled. Now, I believe that the Government ought to give the railroad companies every acre of land that it agreed to give them. These land bounties were offered in order to secure the building of these great railroads, and the companies are entitled to the lands which the Government agreed to give them. But, Mr. Speaker, they are not entitled to land which was not covered by those land grants; and so long as the land remains in the hands of the railroad companies or the original patentees there can be no injustice done if the Government takes back that which properly belongs to it.

But it is contended that if these grants be forfeited it will work injustice to innocent purchasers from the railroad companies or from the patentees. If that were the case, I would say that as the Government has issued its certificates of patent, which have gone into the possession of persons who did not know that the railroad companies or the patentees had entered lands to which they were not entitled, we ought to protect such innocent purchasers. But I say that under the law as it stands to-day the courts of this land have thrown ample protection around those innocent purchasers.

Under the law as laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States, no man who has really purchased any of this land as an innocent purchaser can be affected or harmed by the repeal of this statute. In support of that position, Mr. Speaker, I might refer to a number of cases. The act of 1887 itself protects innocent purchasers. I will not occupy the time of the House in reading many cases (for there are many which support my position); I will refer to only one decision, that of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the United States vs. The California and Oregon Land Company, decided only about two years ago. In that decision (which was delivered by Justice Brewer) the court expressly decides that innocent purchasers under these land grants are protected.

I send the decision to the desk and ask the Clerk to read the portion I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

The right, therefore, of this defendant, the California and Oregon Land Company, to avail itself of a plea can not be doubted, and the plea which it made in the case, that of a bona fide purchaser, is one favored in the law. In the act directing these suits was a clause "saving and preserving the rights of all bona fide purchasers of either of said grants, or of any portion of said grants for a valuable consideration, if any such may be." In Story's Equity Jurisprudence, section 411, the author says: "Indeed, purchasers of this sort (bona fide purchasers) are so much favored in equity that it may be stated to be a doctrine now generally established, that a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice of any defect in his title at the time of his purchase, may lawfully buy in any statute, mortgage or other incumbrance upon the same estate for his protection. If he can defend himself by any of them at law his adversary will have no help in equity to set these incumbrances aside, for equity will not disarm such a purchaser, but will act upon the wise policy of the common law, to protect and quiet lawful possessions and strengthen such titles." And the reason of this is given in Boone vs. Chiles (10 Pet., 177, 210), as follows: "This leads to the reason for protecting an innocent purchaser, holding the legal title, against one who has prior equity; a court of equity can act only on the conscience of a party; if he has done nothing that taints it, no demand can attach upon it, so as to give any jurisdiction. Strong as a plaintiff's equity may be, it can in no case be stronger than that of a purchaser, who has put himself in peril by purchasing a title and paying a valuable consideration without notice of any defect of it or adverse claim to it." (See also, Lee vs. Polk Copper County Company, 21 How., 493, 497, 498; Croxall vs. Shererd, 5 Wall., 268.)

In United States vs. Burlington, etc., Railroad Company (98 U. S., 334, 342) it was said: "It (the United States) certainly could not insist upon a cancellation of the patents so as to affect innocent purchasers under the patentees." And again, in Colorado Coal Company vs. United States (123 U. S., 307, 313): "It is fully established by the evidence that there were in fact no actual settlements and improvements on any of the lands, as falsely set out in the affidavits in support of the preemption claims and in the certificates issued thereon. This undoubtedly constituted an equity as against the parties perpetrating it, or those claiming under them with notice of it, to justify the cancellation of the patents issued to them. But it is not such a fraud as prevents the passing of the legal title of the patents. It follows that to a bill in equity to cancel the patents upon these grounds alone the defense of a bona fide purchaser for value without notice is perfect."

The land company therefore has a right to set up a special plea, and the plea which it did set up, that of a bona fide purchaser, was sufficient, if true.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the decision of the highest court in the land has sustained the proposition that these innocent purchasers are protected, though it may be contended that they ought to go into court and establish that they are bona fide purchasers, while under this bill, or any act that you may pass, if the Government of the United States sees proper to raise the contention that they are not bona fide purchasers they will have to go into court to maintain the proposition that they are innocent purchasers.

You can not say that the Government shall not litigate, if you are going to pass any bill that will authorize the forfeiture of these land grants; and I contend if you pass the bill as it stands instead of the amendment, that in attempting to try to give these innocent purchasers what the law already gives them you will cut off the rights of other innocent persons to these transactions.

There are certain cases where the patentee—the homestead settler—went on the land first; entered and took up his homestead and the railroad company also filed its line of definite location and asked a certificate for particular classes of land so covered. Although the settler was first in possession of the land, although he is an innocent purchaser, under the law the railroad company, having filed its claim with the General Land Office first, has the first standing with the Government; and yet, in some of these very cases, and in many of them, there are instances where the railroad has improperly entered land and is claiming land that does not properly come under the grant. That line of cases has been covered in the decision in the United States vs. The Winona and St. Paul Railway Company and Thomas Marshall, jr., reported in 69 Federal Reports, page 948.

If you pass this act you absolutely cut off any right of the Government to protect the men who went on as bona fide holders and entered their homesteads on the land. But if you repeal the act entirely, as we ask in the substitute, you leave the question open, so that, as to the lands the roads have improperly taken, the Government can forfeit them, and it leaves the homestead settler in possession of his home.

Another view I take in reference to these purchasers—the innocent purchasers (and the Government, I say candidly, ought to protect all of them)—under the existing law, under the statute of 1887, and the decisions arising under that act, similar to the decision I referred to and had read from the desk, all of these people are protected. The courts have gone through that law and have construed it; the settlers know what it is; there is no doubt and nothing left for construction; but if you put a new law on the statute book you establish something that before it is settled must be construed, and you all know that before this statute can be construed some time must elapse, and you only increase the amount of litigation that the settler will be subjected to instead of lessening it.

For that reason I advocate the substitute that is offered by the minority instead of the bill that is offered by the majority; but I say we ought to have some legislation, and if the House is unwilling to accept the substitute, then I shall vote for the bill offered by the majority.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move to amend section 1 of the bill by adding:

Provided, That all lands patented or certified to any State, corporation, or individual, under the rulings or constructions of law of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or the Secretary of the Interior, at the time of the issuance of said patents or certificates, and when no fraud has been committed by the agent of the State or corporation or by the individual, shall be excepted from the operation of the provisions of this act as to extension of time and bringing of suits, and of the act approved March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the adjustment of land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads, and for the forfeiture of unearned lands, and for other purposes."

Mr. Speaker, in the district in which I live there are at least 200,000 acres of land granted to the State of Iowa, to aid in the construction of railroads, nearly forty years ago. This land grant was adjusted and the certification made in 1859. Thirty-seven years have elapsed since the corporation taking under this grant from the State became the owner of these lands. Every acre of this land was sold many years ago, and is now in the hands of settlers—of farmers. In my judgment this bill, notwithstanding the opinions that have been presented here by some gentlemen, does disturb this class and throws a cloud upon every one of these titles.

It is true that there is a clause in this bill whereby at the end of litigation or by filing evidence of the title of the new holder he may not be seriously disturbed. But no one of all those settlers knows what particular tract of land will be selected by the Secretary of the Interior under the act of 1857 as the subject of litigation. Every man's land is clouded with the thought, with the certainty, that the Secretary of the Interior may institute a suit against him. He may be conscious of his ability to defend himself, but he does not want to go to a Federal court, possibly 100 or more miles away, into a community in which he is a stranger, and there make his defense. He can not do it without incurring expense.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of importance. Only a week ago one of my clients wrote to me that, under the act of 1887, although he had his certificate, his duplicate—which under the laws of the State of Iowa is all the evidence of title that he needs—although he has held that for more than forty years, he has recently been notified by the Department that under the readjustment of that Department, going over the old entries, they have discovered that his land was within the limits of a railroad, and was double-minimum rather than single-minimum land. On those lands he had located a Mexican land warrant, paying the difference for the fractional quarter. He was notified of the annulment of his patent, and required to pay the additional sum that would make the aggregate of the double-minimum price, after forty years. I say that is not right, and that there ought to be a statute of limitations that would be a bar against the Government as against individuals.

There is no reason why the officers may be negligent for forty years and then at the end of that time come upon a purchaser, as in this case, not the original purchaser, and require the new owner to make this payment. The other man is dead and gone long ago and his estate has been settled, so there is no possible redress for the present holder. It is not right or proper.

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE], in a speech that he made to this House the other day, told the House that the statute of 1887—to be continued in its operation by this act—was a statute for the recovery of lands fraudulently obtained from the Government. I have taken occasion to make inquiry, and I find that in all of the adjustments in every case where the company has been required, under the provisions of the act of 1887, to make reconveyance, in not a single instance has there been an allegation of fraud.

These cases do not arise even from any mistake of fact. There is neither mistake of fact nor fraud involved in this. They grow out of the changes of construction by the officers to-day differing from those of the officers of twenty, thirty, or forty years ago. For instance, years ago the Department held that in case of a fraudulent preemption, or where a preemption had been abandoned, the preemption entry did not serve to extract the land from the operation of the donating statutes. Under that, in cases of that kind, where the preemption filing had been made, but abandoned, or shown in contest to be fraudulent, the lands were certified to the State, and from the State of Iowa to the railway company. The Department has recently changed that ruling, perhaps under a late decision of the Supreme Court, which holds that that kind of an entry did serve the office of extracting those particular lands from the operation of the granting statute.

Although these lands were long ago certified to the company, although they have sold them, now they require the company to reconvey the lands conveyed to them long ago, which requires the holder of those lands to show that he is at present a bona fide holder in order to prevent the institution of suits against him, and in failure of that, requires him to go to a distant court to make defense to show that he is a bona fide holder. I do not believe that there is any justice in that.

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] the other day said in his speech to the House that these certificates were a mere matter of form (substantially he said that), prepared often by the railroad companies; that their office was simply to serve as notice that those particular lands were claimed by the railway company as lying within the grant. The gentleman was certainly mistaken. This form of patent, this method of certification, was authorized by the statute of 1854. They take the place of patents in land grants. The Federal courts have held that they serve every purpose of patents, and of all the grants that have been made to the State of Iowa or to the railroad companies within that State not one acre is to-day held under any other muniment of title than such a certificate as the gentlemen told us the other day was a mere formal something intended to serve the purpose of notice.

They were authorized by the statute of 1854. At the time of some of the earlier grants his own State was one of the grantees under the act of 1849 of the swamp lands lying within her borders, and the State of Illinois was a grantee under that act to aid in the construction of the Illinois Central Railway. It makes them muniments of title. It was found to be an impossibility almost for the old form to be observed and for patents in each individual case to be issued. It was an almost interminable work, and then the act of 1854 was passed, and it has all the effect, so far as taking its title from the Government is concerned, of the most formal patent that ever was issued in the world.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these lands are patented and have been occupied for thirty or forty years. There is no reason or justice why repose should not be given by statute to all of these titles. If we simply allow time to pass, repose will be given to every one of them on the 3d day of next March, and no one of these settlers can be disturbed. In some of the proposed suits, I learned from the district attorney of the district in which I live, it will be necessary in carrying out the provisions of the act of 1887 to make 2,000 people defendants to these suits. Two thousand people! In these particular cases, when it is all done, what boots it to the Government? It is a conflict between the beneficiaries of two grants.

The Government granted land to the State for swamp-land purposes, and the Government granted land to the State for railroad purposes. There was a conflict between the company and certain counties, who were in their turn grantees, as to who was the owner. These disputes were all composed twenty or twenty-five years ago by compromises and concessions, the one or the other party quitclaiming as to the other. The Government has no title of any kind. It is a conflict that they are proposing to carry on with reference to grants, and when this is all settled, at an expense of infinite litigation, not an acre goes to the Government. Why, then, should we not give repose in this class of cases?

In another instance that I am familiar with, Mr. Speaker, in your own State [Mr. MERCER in the chair], there was a grant to a company when practically, by an error or an oversight on the part of the officers of the United States, the lands lying on the line on either side of the file plat of the road were not withdrawn from market for a considerable period. Settlers came in and took these lands. Later, when the railroad was constructed, it was found that there was not within the limits of the grant a sufficient quantity to meet the purposes of the grant. The Department held that lieu lands might be given—lands in another locality—and the company was compelled to go away beyond its grant to lands that did not have the benefit of the construction of this road and take 201,000 acres, and one block of 10,000 acres of it they sold for $2,500—25 cents an acre; but they took these lands under the then ruling of the Department.

Under the advice of the law officers of the Department, subsequently the Department changed its view. When this was done men of eminence held the position. The lists were not made by railroad attorneys. Some of the lists of which I am speaking bore the signature of Thomas A. Hendricks, the then Commissioner of the General Land Office. He was not a man who transacted his business in the loose way characterized by the gentleman from Arkansas. He was certainly mistaken in the statement that he made that that ruling was adhered to until quite recently. Then they changed the ruling and held that lands must be taken within the prescribed limits or else the entries and selections were void. Now, one of the suits ordered is to recover the title of these lands taken in lieu of those that the company lost through the failure of the Federal officers to withdraw the lands from market.

I am not prepared to say that successful tests might not have been made, but they elected to take the other course and leave the settlers in quiet occupation. Now, sir, these lands in turn are settled. They are not in the hands of corporations, and if my amendment is adopted, every recovery can be had except in cases where the mistake has occurred—if it is a mistake, for I want to say to gentlemen that any lawyer will agree that these are close questions about which men may well differ, though the party in power has said otherwise.

Every acre, I say, will be recovered where a mistake of law, not of fact, a misconstruction of law, an improper ruling, has been made by the officers of the Government, and, in addition to that, where no fraud appears. If there is fraud, notwithstanding the fact that the error was that of the representatives of the Government, recovery may be had. Now, if there is no question of fact; if there is no fraud; if there is no right save that which is grounded in a charge of ruling or construction, I submit that there is no such equity, no such justice, no such condition of affairs as to justify either the remarks made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] the other day or the demands that are made by the provisions of this bill. I hope that the amendment which I have offered may prevail.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, this bill, in every line of it, from the beginning to the end, was drawn with special reference to the protection of the rights of bona fide purchasers. As to the instance that my colleague cites as having occurred in Nebraska, I propose at the proper time to offer an amendment which I think will cover the points he has in mind. I will send the amendment to the Clerk's desk to be read as a part of my remarks, so that it may appear in the RECORD for the information of members.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add at the end of section 1: "Provided, That no suit shall be brought or maintained, nor shall recovery be had for lands or the value thereof, that were certified or patented in lieu of other lands covered by a grant which were lost or relinquished by the grantee in consequence of the failure of the Government or its officers to withdraw the same from sale or entry."

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I hope my colleague will not offer that until a vote has been had on my amendment.

Mr. LACEY. I do not propose to offer it at this time. Let me now briefly call the attention of the House to a difficulty in relation to one of the points embraced in the amendment of my colleague, which is this: His amendment provides that where patents have been erroneously issued without fraud they shall be confirmed. Now, these patents were erroneously issued frequently by the mistake in law or fact of a twelve-hundred-dollar clerk, and subsequently the Supreme Court of the United States decided that they were issued through mistake in the construction of the law. Evidently, if any of the lands thus patented to the company, which it does not own and ought not to have, are still held by the company, they ought to be reconveyed.

This bill protects the title where the lands have been sold, but if any of those lands are still in the hands of the company there is no reason why the patentee should not give them back if they have been erroneously patented, even though there was no fraud whatever. The amendment I have suggested will protect the interest of the settlers on these lands and at the same time it will leave the Government the privilege of acquiring again the titles to unsold lands that were erroneously patented.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand that the general debate is closed, or that the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa could be considered at this time. I understand it has only been read for information.

Mr. LACEY. It has only been read for information.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 19, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

POST-OFFICE MAIL BAG REPAIR DIVISION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster-General, transmitting, in further response to a resolution of the 5th instant relative to the mail bag repair shop of the Post-Office Department, an abstract from the rolls for the first fifteen days of February, 1896; which was read.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the letter be printed and lie on the table. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE], who is interested especially in this matter, is not present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. CALL. I desire to say, without detaining the Senate, that I have been requested by some of the employees of the mail bag repair shop to state that the foreman, Mr. Cullen, and Mr. Tyler, who have been somewhat implicated in the statements and charges heretofore made or implied, are, in the opinion and judgment of these employees, both capable and efficient men and entirely innocent of any charges of neglect or improper conduct. I know both of these persons, and I regard them both as men of character and integrity, and as capable officers in every respect, considerate of the employees and their interest and that of the Government. I desire to make that statement in this connection.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented sundry petitions of citizens of Washington, D. C., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 1886, or some similar measure, requiring the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company to adopt rapid transit on its lines, and remonstrating against the extension of the tracks of that company until its existing lines are modernly equipped and operated; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

2. And be it resolved, That a copy of this resolution, duly certified by the president of the senate and speaker of the house, be sent to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from New Jersey.

This petition I handed to the Senator from Florida nearest me [Mr. PASCO]. He stated that it is signed by influential and responsible people representing the business interests of that part of the State of Florida, but he declined to present the petition himself, because he said he regarded it in some sense as a compliment to me as the introducer of the bill, the petition having been sent to me.

The petition sets forth that, "in view of the great commercial interests centering in our seacoast cities and of their present defenseless condition," the bill for the defense of our harbors and seaports should receive attention at the hands of Congress.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

ORDER OF PETITIONS.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I hold in my hand several hundred petitions which have been sent to me from various parts of the country, and especially from the State of New York. They have accumulated during the past ten days. They relate principally to the question, the important question, of the sale of beer on Ellis Island.

Ellis Island, as the Senate well knows, is where the immigrants land on coming to this country. The persons engaged in this movement have been very industrious and have prepared printed petitions which have been circulated all over the country. I desire simply to read one of the petitions:

Petition to the United States Senate and House of Representatives.

Your petitioners, citizens of the State of New York and representatives of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, realizing the demoralizing effect which the sale of beer has upon immigrants landing at Ellis Island, and believing the payment of $10,500 annually into the United States Treasury for the privilege of such sale to be a stigma upon our National Government, etc.

And the petitioners request the passage of a measure that will prohibit the sale of beer at Ellis Island. There is another petition upon the same subject, printed in a little different form, which says simply that the sale at Bedloes Island "is a source of serious injury to the men stationed there."

Mr. President, I can not very well see how the sale of beer to immigrants landing at Ellis Island can be of very great injury to the temperance cause or can seriously affect the health or lives of the immigrants who land there. On the contrary, I am disposed to think that a glass of beer would be very welcome to the immigrants upon their landing in this country.

The vast effort made by well-meaning, but misguided people in endeavoring to flood Congress with these petitions shows the crusade, the extreme Puritanism, or the extreme Rooseveltism, if I might use that term, that is in progress in the State of New York and in the country.

Not only that, but I have also received from various parts of my State divers petitions from various societies asking that Congress should pass a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; and some of the petitioners state that they desire to have Congress pass a law for the District of Columbia that is equal to the most efficient State Sunday law anywhere in the country. It is difficult for me to see exactly how the people of my State are particularly interested in a Sunday law for the District of Columbia, unless possibly it may be to affect or regulate the conduct of their Senators and Members of Congress.

Of course the people throughout the country have a right to petition Congress on any subject. The right of petition I would carefully preserve and guard. Yet we all know that in these days of newspapers and telegraphs and other improvements petitions are not of that great value practically that they used to be, when about the only way the people could manifest public sentiment and acquaint Congress with their desires was by petitions.

I venture the assertion that very soon after these petitions are received they are quietly packed away and but little attention is paid to them. That must necessarily be so. My friend upon my right [Mr. ALLEN] suggests that they go to the junk dealer; and possibly in that respect they may relieve the wants of our Treasury.

Mr. ALLEN. No, I did not make that suggestion; I suggested that possibly they might go to the junk dealer in violation of the spirit of the law.

Mr. HILL. The spirit of the law requires these petitions to be presented, read, acted upon, and disposed of.

Mr. President, I am disposed of course under the present rules of the Senate to present these petitions, as I received them, calling the attention of the Senate to them as heretofore. However, this mania for the presentation of petitions has broken out especially upon the temperance subject. I find that among these petitions sent to me there is one which recites that the sale of cider, especially in the villages and towns, is a source of great harm to the community, and the petitioners want the sale of cider prohibited. But I discover that the petition, which comes in a folder addressed to Congress, is a part of the crusade in my State and is addressed to the legislature of the State, so carelessly is this whole business conducted.

I will inflict upon the Secretary of this body this immense number of petitions, but I think that we ought to be relieved from their presentation each morning. The morning hour is very much crowded, the morning two hours, and if we could relieve this time from the presentation of petitions it strikes me it would expedite public business. I think we might well follow the precedent which has been set in various parts of the country in doing away with the public presentation of petitions. The Constitution will stand; the Government of our fathers will not be injured by it. In a large number of the legislatures of the States it has been done away with, and boxes are provided for the receipt of the petitions. I would still have them entered upon the Journal, but I would allow Senators, if they see fit, to present them to the Secretary quietly each day of the session, and then they could thereafter be properly entered. The House of Representatives has such a rule. The legislature in my own State has such a rule; and in a large number of legislatures throughout the country the old practice of formally rising and presenting petitions, which are never thereafter heard of or very seriously considered, has been done away with.

In the presentation of these petitions this morning, and in connection with this subject, I give a notice which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the notice.

The Secretary read as follows:

Senator HILL gives notice that at some future day he will move to amend subdivision 4 of Rule VII of the Senate so as to read as follows:

"4. Every petition or memorial shall be signed by the petitioner or memorialist, and have indorsed thereon a brief statement of its contents, and shall be presented and referred without debate, or the petition or memorial may be delivered to the Secretary with the name of the Senator presenting the same, and the disposition to be made indorsed thereon; when such petition or memorial shall be entered in the Journal and in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the same as if presented from the floor. But no petition or memorial or other paper signed by the citizens or subjects of a foreign power shall be received, unless the same be transmitted to the Senate by the President."

The purpose of such amendment is to facilitate the transaction of business in the Senate, and to leave it optional with each Senator whether he will present petitions and memorials in open Senate or to the Secretary.

Mr. HILL. I ask simply that that be presented, and I assume, of course, that it will lie on the table. The only change which it makes in the existing rule is that Senators may still continue to present petitions, if they desire to do so, in open session, but it permits any other Senator who prefers to do so to hand the same quietly to the Secretary.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire the attention of the Senator from New York for a moment. I understand the fact to be, and that the petitions he now presents assume the fact to be, that no spirituous liquors, nothing but malt liquors, are sold or used at Ellis Island.

Mr. HILL. The petition seems to assume that other liquors are sold. While it only speaks of the sale of beer, yet at the conclusion of the petition the petitioners ask that not only beer shall be prohibited from being sold, but all other liquors.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator, as he has called public attention to this subject in this emphatic way, whether he does not understand it to be the fact that at the immigrant station at Ellis Island there are sold no spirituous liquors whatever; nothing but beer?

Mr. HILL. I had assumed so.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think that is the fact, and it should be known; and that there is no more quiet or orderly place in the country than Ellis Island as it is now conducted as an immigrant station.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petitions presented by the Senator from New York will be appropriately referred.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 259) granting to the Columbia and Red Mountain Railway Company a right of way through the Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 879) to amend an act entitled "An act to grant to the Gainesville, McAlester and St. Louis Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory," with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 1889) granting an honorable discharge to F. L. Taylor from December 2, 1864;

A bill (H. R. 5286) providing for disposal of lands lying within the Fort Klamath Hay Reservation, not included in the Klamath Indian Reservation, in Oregon;

A bill (H. R. 5382) to authorize the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Memphis Railroad Company to extend its line of railroad into the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 121) calling upon the Secretary of War for certain information in relation to the harbor at Manitowoc, in the State of Wisconsin.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 1676) to change and fix the time for holding the district and circuit courts of the United States for the northern division of the eastern district of Tennessee.

MANITOWOC HARBOR IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to ask that the joint resolution calling upon the Secretary of War for information in regard to the harbor of Manitowoc may be laid before the Senate. It is a concurrent resolution under the law that was passed requiring both Houses to join in certain requests for information, and it merely asks for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays the joint resolution before the Senate.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 121) calling upon the Secretary of War for certain information in relation to the harbor at Manitowoc, in the State of Wisconsin, was read twice by its title.

Mr. HILL. Is that a joint resolution or a concurrent resolution?

Mr. VILAS. I understand that there is now a necessity for both Houses of Congress, under a recent law, to concur in such a resolution. It is a joint resolution.

Mr. FRYE. It must be a joint resolution under the law.

Mr. VILAS. It must be a joint resolution under the law in order to obtain the information.

Mr. HILL. And the President must sign it?

Mr. VILAS. The other House have asked for the information and were obliged to put their request in the form of a joint resolution, as I was informed by one of their members, who desired me to call it up here.

Mr. HILL. And the President must sign it?

Mr. HARRIS. Necessarily.

Mr. VILAS. I suppose so.

Mr. HILL. Of course if it is a statute, a joint resolution, that settles it. I rose to make the inquiry whether a concurrent resolution is not the proper measure. Then the President, of course, would have nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. HOAR. I wish this matter might stand over until the close of the morning business. The Chair in his discretion may lay it before the Senate after the routine business is concluded.

Mr. VILAS. I did not suppose that it would lead to one moment's objection or delay.

Mr. HOAR. Let it go over until after the morning business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there are no further petitions or memorials, reports of committees are next in order.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 713) for the relief of the legal representatives of Chauncey M. Lockwood, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 534) for the relief of L. A. Davis, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 190) for the relief of J. M. Billings, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am directed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to report a bill, which I ask to be read twice and placed upon the Calendar with the accompanying report. As soon as the report is printed I give notice that I shall ask the Senate to take it up at the earliest possible day.

The bill (S. 2169) to regulate mail matter of the fourth class was read twice by its title.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It appears that the custom has grown up in the different Departments of this Government of shipping as fourth-class mail matter, under a construction of the law which is not in my opinion tenable, all sorts of material. The Treasury Department ships great bundles of locks, electric motors, and other heavy ironware all over the country free, and it is charged to the Post-Office Department. The Interior Department ships roller desks and typewriters with their desks, which go all over the country free. The Coast and Geodetic Survey ships by mail as fourth-class matter tents and tent poles and the baggage of its members. All this great weight is carried in the mails of the country free, against the protest of the Post-Office Department, and is charged to the Post-Office Department and not to the Department which ships it.

The abuse has grown to be so gross that additional men have to be employed at the leading post-offices of the country to handle the enormous and bulky freight, sometimes weighing from twelve to fourteen hundred pounds, which is turned in as fourth-class mail matter and shipped for nothing. At times the postal-car doors have to be taken out and widened in order that this stuff may be carried free at the expense of the Government.

The amendment to the law which the committee has reported is to the effect that the matter emanating from the Department must be written or printed, so that all packages of material must be limited to 4 pounds in weight or must be written or printed matter emanating from the different Departments of the Government.

As I said, I ask that the report and the appendix which accompanies it may be printed, and I give notice that at the earliest possible day I shall call up the bill and ask the Senate to act upon it, for the sooner the abuse is corrected the better.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. WOLCOTT, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2146) to amend section 4 of the act approved March 2, 1895, being an act amendatory of an act with reference to the postal service, reported the same favorably, with amendments, and moved its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 652) for the relief of Nancy E. Day, administratrix of the estate of James L. Day, deceased, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the draft of a resolution presented by Mr. CULLOM February 12, 1896, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to close up the sinking-fund account of the Pacific railroads, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads; which was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be withdrawn.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 2185) pertaining to the sale of liquor to Indians; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PEFFER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2186) granting a pension to Elizabeth E. Bay; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 2187) to pension Thomas F. Leahy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2188) granting increase of pension to John J. Boatwright; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CALL. I introduce by request a bill to provide for the publication of a periodical which shall be known as the Congressional Cloture. I have not examined the measure and I do not wish to be held responsible for it.

The bill (S. 2189) to provide for the publication of a periodical which shall be known as the Congressional Cloture was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ELKINS introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 81) to revive the grade of Lieutenant-General in the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THE REVENUE BILL AND SILVER COINAGE.

Mr. CARTER. I offer a resolution and ask that it be read for information and that it lie on the table. I desire next Monday, or on such other day as may suit the convenience of the Senate and when the public business will permit, to submit some observations upon the resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the bill H. R. 2749, reported by the Committee on Finance with an amendment, be recommitted to that committee for further consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table for the present.

SALES AND PROCEEDS OF SALES OF BONDS.

Mr. LODGE. I offer a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be directed to investigate and report generally all the material facts and circumstances connected with the sale of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury in the years 1894, 1895, and 1896, and how the proceeds of such bonds were disposed of, and to what purposes the said proceeds were devoted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HILL. I should like to examine the resolution more carefully than I have time to do now, and I suggest that it go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

ALLEGED ASSESSMENTS IN THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER], coming over from a previous day.

The SECRETARY. A resolution by Mr. PEFFER, instructing the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to make an investigation as to the levying and collection of assessments for political purposes from employees of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. PEFFER. Let the resolution be passed over, retaining its place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to that course? The Chair hears none.

MANITOWOC HARBOR IMPROVEMENT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the joint resolution from the House of Representatives, for which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] desires present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. Res. 121) calling upon the Secretary of War for certain information in relation to the harbor at Manitowoc, in the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. HILL. Will it not be sufficient, I ask the Senator from Wisconsin, to have that a concurrent resolution? Otherwise it must go to the President to be signed. I can not think, unless we have passed some statute inadvertently, that Congress has tied its hands so that it can not get one of these estimates from a Department of the Government without the approval of the President.

Mr. VILAS. I have been trying to find the law with the aid of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, the committee from which the law emanated originally, but I am unable to find it.

Mr. BLANCHARD. If the Senator from Wisconsin will yield to me a moment, I am able to furnish him the law.

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.

Mr. BLANCHARD. This law was passed, not inadvertently, as the Senator from New York seems to think, but——

Mr. HILL. Let me ask what is the law? Let us understand that. Is a joint resolution or a concurrent resolution required?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will read the law. In the river and harbor act approved July 13, 1892, the following provision may be found, being the last paragraph of that law:

That after the regular or formal report on any examination, survey, project, or work under way or proposed is submitted, no supplemental or additional report or estimate, for the same fiscal year, shall be made unless ordered by a resolution of Congress.

Mr. HILL. That means not a joint resolution, but a concurrent resolution, of course.

Mr. BLANCHARD. It does not contemplate such a resolution as requires Executive signature, but it does require a resolution which must be passed by both Houses of Congress.

I will state the reason briefly for the enactment of this law. Those who have been chiefly concerned with river and harbor improvement appropriations in Congress for some years past are aware that the aggregate of estimates submitted by the United States engineers for all the river and harbor projects of improvement throughout the United States usually foot up from $35,000,000 to $45,000,000 annually. Now, it has been found impossible to pass any river and harbor act of anything like that size. Accordingly, the River and Harbor Committee of the House and the Commerce Committee of the Senate have been under the necessity of reporting appropriations very much below the estimates of the engineers. They have been compelled to report appropriations amounting only to from 25 per cent to 50 per cent of the estimates.

With estimates for a fiscal year amounting to about $40,000,000, and it being impracticable for the committee to bring in a river and harbor bill for any such aggregate sum, it was found that to permit a resolution to be passed through one or the other House calling upon the War Department for additional estimates to be piled on top of the $40,000,000 was simply adding to the embarrassment already existing. So the matter was brought to the attention of the River and Harbor Committee of the House at the time when I had the honor to be chairman of that committee, and the Chief of Engineers appeared before the committee and advised legislation to prevent it.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask——

Mr. BLANCHARD. If the Senator will allow me one minute, it was deemed advisable to stop, in some measure, this custom that had grown up of adding constantly, by the simple method of having one House ask for it, additional estimates to embarrass the committees. So the provision I have read was incorporated in the river and harbor act of that year. Now I will yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator from Louisiana if under that law the concurrence of both Houses is necessary to this resolution?

Mr. BLANCHARD. The concurrence under this law of both Houses in the resolution is necessary.

Mr. HOAR. Then I want to ask the Senator what he thinks of this provision of the Constitution:

Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States, and before the same shall take effect shall be approved by him.

If it is necessary that both Houses concur, as the Senator states, how is it possible that such a resolution can have any legal effect whatever without the President's approbation?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I believe as regards concurrent resolutions it has been the practice to pass them through both Houses, and thus to give force and effect to them without being submitted to the Executive. I suppose it is intended that the present resolution shall follow this custom. There is a question, as I understand from older legislators than myself, whether a concurrent resolution, like a joint resolution, does not have to be signed by the Executive.

Mr. HOAR. As I understand, the concurrent resolutions which may be adopted by both bodies without the assent of the President are resolutions which have no legal force or operative effect as laws, or as affecting the duties of any Department of the Government, but are mere expressions of opinion or purpose. But in this case the War Department is prohibited by law from making surveys and estimates or sending them into either House of Congress, unless there be a resolution of both Houses. So that that is a resolution having legal effect and determining the rule or law of action for an Executive Department and having the force of law. I do not see, therefore, why, taking the Senator's answer to my first question, a joint resolution is not necessary, as it comes within the very letter of the Constitution, as well as the spirit and purpose of it, and should therefore go to the President for his approval.

Mr. BLANCHARD. If the position taken by the Senator from Massachusetts be a correct one, that all resolutions passed by the two Houses of Congress, before force and effect can be given to them, must receive the approval of the Executive, then this resolution must be approved by the Executive; but I am told, I repeat, by Senators who have had longer experience in these matters than I have, that what are called concurrent resolutions have heretofore been given force and effect without being required to be submitted to the Executive. The only point I was making was that under the terms of the law which I have read no additional estimates in a fiscal year for river and harbor projects of improvement can be made unless ordered by a resolution of Congress, not merely by one House of Congress.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, this question has been before the Senate heretofore. As I have understood the contention of those who believe that a concurrent resolution does not require the Executive sanction, it is based upon a technicality, and a mere technicality, and that is the word "concurrent." I have never myself had any doubt that the concurrent action of the other House is the action of Congress. Whether the other House concurs or acts in a primary way, if you so term it, makes no sort of difference as to the effect on the Constitution. I have not myself the slightest doubt, and never have had, that concurrent resolutions of both Houses of Congress require the action of the President upon them. I know the custom has grown up here and the question has been raised at least twice in the Senate within my service, but it has gone by without any determinate action on the part of the Senate. I simply state my individual opinion. I never could see any valid argument against it.

Mr. VILAS. I think it perfectly clear from what has been said by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] that this ought to be a joint resolution, and that it was properly sent here by the House of Representatives in the form in which it is now presented. Obviously, when the law requires a resolution of Congress to accomplish a certain end, that resolution must be passed in accordance with the Constitution. I take it that a concurrent resolution has simply the force of the body which passes it, subject to its taking effect upon the contingency that the other body concurs in it, and it can have no more effect than the resolution of one House of Congress. Whatever one House of Congress can do can be done by concurrent resolution, but no more.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. President, if there be any difference between a concurrent resolution and a joint resolution, and if that difference be that one must be approved by the Executive and the other not, and this resolution which has been called up for consideration by the Senator from Wisconsin is a joint resolution, it would have, of course, the effect which it is intended to have, if it be passed by this body, it having already been by the House of Representatives, and is approved by the President. It will do what the law I have read requires to be done before an additional estimate can be sent to Congress. I contend that additional estimates could be had, under the law which I have read, through the instrumentality of what is called a concurrent resolution. A fortiori will a joint resolution accomplish the same purpose?

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the joint resolution be again read.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, this being a joint resolution, it must be sent to the President of the United States for his signature; but that was not what was contemplated by the law which was read to us by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD]. The object of that law was undoubtedly to prevent unusual and unnecessary calls by committees of the two Houses and by individual members upon the War Department for papers, often very difficult to obtain, and sometimes necessary to be copied.

It seems to me a concurrent resolution is not a law in any sense, and therefore need not be signed by the President. It is a mere request upon an executive officer to furnish a legislative body certain information, and it never has been regarded in any other light than as a request which may be declined, and has been declined over and over again, by the heads of Departments, either for want of clerical force or from some other cause. Such resolutions may be passed, and are always respected by the Executive Departments, but they are not imperative or mandatory, nor have they in any sense the force of law.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to ask if this is a joint resolution which has come over from the House of Representatives?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. LODGE. Has it been before any committee of the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has not been before a committee of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I think it ought to take the usual course, Mr. President, and I object to its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being interposed——

Mr. VILAS. The joint resolution is already in Committee of the Whole, as has been twice announced by the President of the Senate. If objection were to be made, it should have been made in the beginning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. An objection to the joint resolution being read the third time will take it over for the day.

Mr. VILAS. Then I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and it is so ordered.

A. H. LAZARE.

Mr. GORDON. On yesterday the Senate adopted a resolution calling upon the Secretary of State for certain information. I now offer a resolution, and ask that it be adopted, in order to secure additional information to that asked for.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate what efforts, if any, have been made by the Department to induce the Republic of Haiti to pay to A. H. Lazare, a citizen of the United States, the amount awarded him by Judge William Strong in his award as arbitrator.

Mr. GORDON. I ask unanimous consent for the adoption of the resolution at this time.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

CATTLE QUARANTINE IN SOUTHWESTERN STATES.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, some days ago I moved to refer a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, in answer to a resolution which I had the honor to offer calling upon him for information in regard to the cattle quarantine line in Texas, to the Select Committee on Transportation and Sale of Meat Products. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] then asked that the motion lie over, in order that he might address the Senate on the subject. I now desire to call up that motion for the action of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. PEFFER and Mr. PLATT. What is the motion?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri moves to refer to the Select Committee on Transportation and Sale of Meat Products a communication the indorsement on which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A letter of the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the Senate dated February 12, 1896, copies of the regulations establishing the quarantine line in the Southwestern States for the years 1895 and 1896.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I beg to say that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Missouri two or three days ago, in which he cast some censure on the Secretary of Agriculture, I felt that the resolution ought to be discussed. Since then I have learned, by intercourse with friends in Illinois, that this is a very interesting question, and that it ought properly to go to the committee indicated by the Senator from Missouri. Therefore I shall not at this time detain the Senate with any remarks upon the subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, to refer the communication to the Select Committee on Transportation and Sale of Meat Products.

The motion was agreed to.

REGULATION OF MARRIAGES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, if the morning business is through, I have a bill in charge which it is very important should be passed, and I do not think it will give rise to much discussion.

It is the bill to regulate marriages in the District of Columbia, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1904) to regulate marriages in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator who reported the bill if it be intended as a complete code or collection of all the provisions of law in relation to the solemnizing of marriages, or is it merely by way of amendment?

Mr. FAULKNER. There are a number of provisions which are not absolutely obsolete in the statutes of the District which have been compiled under the authority of Congress which are not affected by this bill.

Mr. HOAR. I was led to put that question by the first section of the bill, which provides:

That if any person intending to marry in the District of Columbia be under 21 years of age and has not been previously married, the consent of the father or guardian, or, if there be none, of the mother of such person, shall be given either personally to the clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia or his deputy, or in writing, etc.

Suppose the father is in a distant country, suppose the person desirous of marrying be a German, a Russian, or an Armenian, and 20 years old, what is to happen if the law of the District, as this bill leaves it, absolutely prohibits such marriage?

Mr. FAULKNER. If the persons appear before the clerk and admit that they are under the age prescribed by the statute and have no guardian, I suppose it would be a prohibition, as would be the case by the law of any State of which I have knowledge.

Mr. HOAR. I think not, but I will not speak hastily——

Mr. FAULKNER. The remedy can be applied at once by the party having a guardian appointed to give consent, when there is no natural guardian.

Mr. HOAR. I will not speak hastily, but I suppose in most of the States that some fine or penalty is imposed upon the magistrate or clergyman performing a marriage in such cases, but that the marriage itself is valid.

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not mean to say that the marriage would be invalid, because, in my judgment—and I believe that is the concurrence of authority—no marriage is declared invalid by the court unless the language of the statute is such that it compels that conclusion as the intent of the legislature in passing it.

Mr. HOAR. I am entirely in sympathy with the Senator's desire to have the marriage laws in this District regulated by some clear, simple, and just enactment, and I have no doubt that the Senator has made such a provision; but if it be true, as I understood the first answer of the Senator, that it is essential to the validity of the marriage of a minor, not merely as a matter for the punishment of a magistrate or a clergyman, but that it is essential to the validity of the marriage, then the question I put becomes a very serious one; and that is, what is to happen if the parent live in a distant country and can not give his assent? Take the case of a young woman 20 years old. The Senator answers that the matter can be remedied by having a guardian appointed who shall give his consent. That suggests another question. Is there any provision of law here by which, there being no property, it not being intended to intrust the guardian with the care of property, a guardian may be appointed for the mere purpose of giving assent to a marriage?

Mr. FAULKNER. I will answer that question by saying that any next friend or the minor himself may have a guardian appointed, where there is no natural guardian, in all the jurisdictions that I know of. But if the Senator understood me to say that if a party under the age prescribed by the statute should marry, this provision would invalidate that marriage, he misunderstood me. Such is not my understanding of the trend of the decisions in this country. There is no provision of the section invalidating the marriage by reason of one or both of the parties being under age, and under authorities construing such directory provisions I am satisfied the courts, for that reason, would not avoid the marriage.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will allow me to express my dissent from his views of the law, with great deference, I did not suppose that it was a rule of law in the jurisdictions with which I have been familiar that a guardian could be appointed whether there were property or not. I understand that guardians can be appointed by the proper courts always for persons who have the control of property, and that guardians ad litem may be appointed to represent the interest of the minor in any particular legal proceeding, and that guardians may be appointed also in other cases especially provided for by statute, but I am not aware that there is existing in those places with which I am familiar any law by which a guardian can be appointed for the mere purpose of giving or withholding consent to the marriage of the minor, and for no other purpose whatever. If there be such a law in the District of Columbia, I should like to see it.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask that the amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia to strike out section 6 may be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 6, as follows:

SEC. 6. That if any female under the age of 21 shall marry without the consent of her father or guardian, or, if she has none, of her mother, the supreme court of the District of Columbia shall, upon the petition of her next friend, commit her estate to a receiver, who shall give bond before the court and shall hold the said estate and pay out the rents and profits thereof to her separate use, under the direction of the court until she arrives at the age of 21 years, and at any time thereafter the court may direct the same to be delivered to her as her sole and separate property.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER. Section 6 having been stricken out, it is necessary that the numbers of the sections following should be changed so as to conform to the new arrangement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

Mr. FAULKNER. In section [8] 7, on page 4, line 10, I move to insert:

Whether he or she is a citizen of the United States or of a foreign country if a citizen of a foreign country, whether all the requirements of the laws relating to marriage in the country of which he or she is a citizen have been complied with.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. I have not the slightest objection to the general purpose of this bill, though I am not able to say what provisions in the Maryland statutes will be repealed by the last section; but I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia who is in charge of the bill why the marriageable age has been fixed at 21 years in the first section as to both sexes. In the State of Missouri—I will not undertake to answer for other States—the age of lawful consent upon the part of the woman is 18 years.

Mr. CULLOM. So it is in Illinois.

Mr. VEST. And I think, as Senators around me state, that is the provision generally in the statutes of the different States.

As a matter of course the object of these laws and of such a provision as I am now discussing is to prevent improvident marriages, where it is to be presumed that the parties are not of the age to give that maturity of judgment and legitimate consent that ought to be given to a transaction so important as marriage. On the other hand, the statutes of every State, it goes without saying, ought to conform to natural law. I submit that when we say that a woman 18 years old has not come to marriageable age it is rather a strained conclusion, and one to which I think no man of judgment would give his assent. As to a man, 21 years is the age at which he is presumed to have arrived at all the responsibilities of manhood throughout the different States of the Union; but that is not so as to women. I suggest to the Senator from West Virginia if it would not be better to make that limitation of 21 years apply to the male sex, and as to women 18 years, and then it would conform to the general provisions of the statutes of all the States.

Mr. FAULKNER. In reply to the Senator from Missouri, I will state that that is exactly the way in which I myself drafted that section, but the sentiment of the committee, after giving most thorough examination to this bill, in fact more so than to any other bill I have ever known to be before it, holding two sessions on the subject, was adverse to my own views, and they seemed to think that the age of both should be 21. Personally, I agree with the Senator from Missouri, that the age of the male should be kept at 21 and that of the female fixed at 18. If the Senator should offer an amendment to that effect, I should not feel as if I could controvert the proposition contained in it.

Mr. GEORGE. Section 4 seems, so far as I can understand it, to make a very radical, not to say revolutionary, change in the relation to marriages which are not consummated according to law. Marriage statutes have usually been construed to be merely directory, and persons who violated them were subject to penalties; but it has not heretofore, I believe, as to the mere forms, ever been held or enacted that a marriage contrary to these forms consummated should be null and void. Certainly it would be a very extraordinary position in which at least the alleged wife of one of these marriages would find herself, if, after the consummation of the marriage, after living together for some time, it should be discovered and then adjudged that the marriage was null and void from the beginning, and that she had been living in a state of unlawful cohabitation.

Marriage laws have been carefully framed heretofore to prevent that state of affairs, although they have prescribed certain rules as to age, as to getting consent, as to license, as to the publication of banns, and all that sort of thing, yet the law up to this time, generally at least, has been that, notwithstanding the omission to observe these forms, still the marriage is good if the parties be above the age of what is called consent—12, I believe, in the common law in a female, and 14 in a male.

After very careful reading of section 4, I believe under that section that, unless all the forms prescribed in the statute be observed except one, the marriage is null and void; and I call the attention of the Senator from West Virginia to what I am now about to read:

SEC. 4. That every marriage in this District shall be under license, and solemnized in the manner herein provided—

Then follows this provision—but no marriage heretofore or hereafter solemnized by any person professing to be authorized to solemnize the same shall be deemed or adjudged to be void, nor shall the validity thereof be in any way affected on account of any want of authority in such person.

So the only case, according to this section 4, in which a marriage contrary to the rules prescribed by this statute shall not be void is the case where there is a want of authority on the part of the person solemnizing it; that is to say, that as to anything else, any other nonobservance of the statute, the parties after marriage find themselves in a condition where they are not married. I call the attention of the Senator and of the Senate to that.

I should be unwilling to ever put upon the statute book any provision which would make void a marriage actually solemnized where the parties are of the age of consent, or where there was no duress, or anything of that sort, which enabled the parties afterwards to escape.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will say very frankly to the Senator from Mississippi that if his construction of that section is correct the committee are unanimously opposed to the section, and the section fails to accomplish the purpose for which it was inserted in the bill. It is a saving clause sustaining the validity of marriages, noncompliance in which provision some of the courts have held would be sufficient to invalidate a marriage.

As to the other subjects to which the Senator refers, such as licenses, banns being published, etc., the Supreme Court of the United States in passing upon questions arising under this old law of Maryland has held that such provisions, as the Senator stated very properly, were directory, and therefore the marriage was not invalidated by a failure to comply with them; but that the minister and the parties contracting the marriage were liable to the penalties imposed by the statute. Where a party assumes to be a minister, or where a person is married by a party not authorized in any way to solemnize the rite of marriage, some of the courts have held that in such a case the marriage is invalid and void. The object of this section is to correct and to relieve past and future marriages of that character, where the parties honestly believed they were married by a person having authority to perform that ceremony, so that the marriage could not be invalidated by reason of that fact.

As to the provision relating to the honest belief on the part of the man or woman that the person solemnizing the marriage was authorized to do so, I should like to obtain the judgment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and I submit to him that the only construction which can be fairly put upon that section is that it does not permit the court to declare marriages invalid which have been solemnized by a person pretending to have the authority to perform such ceremony, but who, in fact, is not clothed with that power, the parties contracting, or one of them, believing the person was authorized to perform the marriage rites.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia a question arising out of the second and third sections of the bill. Suppose a man does not belong to any religious society?

Mr. FAULKNER. Under those circumstances and under the law of the District to-day he could not solemnize the rites of marriage. He must belong to some religious society.

Mr. HOAR. I am not speaking of that; but it answers one thing I should like to know. But suppose the persons to be married do not belong to any religious society; they may have a religion of their own, or they may deny that they have any religion of their own, and they do not propose to agree to the doctrine of the church that marriage is a sacrament to be celebrated only by persons authorized to administer the sacraments of the church, is it the purpose of the framers of this bill not to allow such persons to be married at all?

Mr. FAULKNER. Yes; there is no question about that, provided they decline to be married by a minister or one appointed by his religious association to perform the ceremony of marriage.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have added to this bill two things, and I wish the Senator from West Virginia would allow it to go over to enable me to prepare them. One is a provision for marriages by either a justice of the peace or some other civil magistrate. I suppose it is needless to say that my opinions on such subjects would induce me to desire to have a relative of mine married according to the rites and forms of the religious denomination to which I belong; I have no scruple of my own, of course, but there are a great many persons who do not wish to consent to the forms of any religious society in existence. The Quakers, who, of course, are protected by this bill, can not be conscientiously married by an Episcopal clergyman. Of course this bill would probably treat Quakers as a religious society without ordained ministers and recognize marriages according to their particular forms, but there are other persons not Quakers who have the same right. So I think the District of Columbia should follow what I suppose is the practice of all the States, and allow persons who deem marriage a civil contract, not a sacrament, to be lawfully married by a civil magistrate.

In the next place, I think the bill should contain and not leave, considering the history of the law of this District especially, to obscure or doubtful interpretation or construction the legality of the marriage entered into by a young woman who supposes she is lawfully married, and that the person marrying her has the right to do that when in fact there is a mistake, where a minister of the gospel is impersonated. Everyone who is familiar with English fiction or English history knows how often in past times in England young women of beauty and attraction were deceived by infamous and designing men. The plot of one of the most celebrated fictions, Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield, turns on that very thing; and it turned out that the person——

Mr. FAULKNER. I should like to know if the fourth section does not answer that very point?

Mr. HOAR. It turned out that the supposed minister of the gospel was not such, but was in fact a fraudulent person. It seems to me that ought to be put in unmistakable language.

Mr. FAULKNER. Is not the fourth section of the bill in unmistakable language?

Mr. VEST. Section 4 covers that point.

Mr. FAULKNER. I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to that section. It gave me as much trouble to draw as any section in the bill, and I think clearly expresses that idea.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps it does. The fourth section escaped my attention at the moment.

Mr. FAULKNER. As to the other point. I should like to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I did not attempt to make any radical changes in the law. I found the law in the District of Columbia in reference to marriage in such a condition that it is a disgrace to the civilization of this country and to the capital of this nation. I regard marriage as one of the most important subjects of legislation, as on its validity depend not only legitimacy, but the transmission of property and all the rights that grow out of those two great subjects. For that reason it was important the law should be amended, obsolete provisions repealed, and full evidence preserved of the fact of marriages in this District.

The provisions of the old Maryland act have been obsolete, unknown, and unacted upon for many years. There has not been a marriage solemnized within the limits of the District of Columbia within the last fifty years which conformed fully with those provisions. The courts have wisely held them directory and sustained the validity of the marriage, but have left the parties who have violated its provisions amenable to its penalties. It is, therefore, an important, urgent necessity that the law shall be amended and those sections repealed, as publicity has now been given to its provisions, encouraging the malicious or the blackmailer to seek the enforcement of penalties prescribed by the terms of this antiquated and forgotten law.

I think the proposed law has been carefully drawn to remove the absurdities and doubts of the existing law, while at the same time it modernizes and simplifies the law upon this important subject for the future. The reason the committee did not put in any clause giving civil magistrates authority over this subject was that it had never existed in the District, and we did not deem it wise to bring forward too many new questions, the main object in view being to secure the enactment of a law under which marriages could be solemnized in the District without the contracting parties or the person authorized to officiate being subject to onerous penalties.

Mr. HOAR. I beg the Senator's pardon, but there is a third point that I think ought to be considered, besides the legitimacy of children and having a proper record, and that is the security of women who could be made the objects of artful and designing and unprincipled persons. I think if we are going to pass any law on this subject it ought to contain what I believe every Senator will agree should be the law; that is, a provision that parties who desire to be married by a civil magistrate may have that opportunity. It will take only a line or two to draw it, to insert a clause providing that parties may be married by a justice of the peace.

In the next place, I think there should be some more distinct provision as to what is to happen if the parents be at a distance and there be no guardian. I do not think that the question of the right to appoint a temporary guardian under such circumstances, like a guardian ad litem, should be left to construction or inference or doubt; it ought to be put into the law. I wish the Senator would let his bill lie over one day and let that clause be inserted.

Mr. FAULKNER. Of course I will comply with the Senator's request; but if he inserts the provision authorizing the civil magistrates to marry he will find that almost every section of the bill will have to be rewritten or amended.

Mr. HOAR. I think not.

Mr. FAULKNER. Yes; because the theory upon which the bill is framed is that in the clerk's office of the superior court of the District every question that involves the validity or the regularity of a marriage shall be of record.

Mr. HOAR. The civil magistrate can send his records there just as well as clergymen.

Mr. FAULKNER. With the understanding that the bill will be taken up to-morrow after the routine morning business, I will let it go over so that the Senator from Massachusetts can examine it.

Mr. VEST. Before the bill goes over I wish to make a single observation. At the suggestion of the Senator from West Virginia I will offer an amendment now, so that if there is any objection to it it may go over with the bill.

In line 3 of the first section of the bill, between the words "any" and "person," I propose to insert the word "male"; so as to read "if any male person intending to marry in the District of Columbia, and being under the age of 21 years."

Then, between the word "age" and the word "and," in the fourth line, immediately succeeding, I propose to insert the words "and any female under 18 years of age." That simply requires that the man shall be 21 and the woman 18 instead of 21. It diminishes the marriageable age of the woman from 21 to 18 years, which I think is in the interest of the purity of woman and of society.

I wanted, however, to make one other observation before the bill went over. I think it is eminently proper that marriages should be solemnized in the District of Columbia by a civil magistrate where the parties desire it. It is very well known that there are very reputable people and intellectual people in the United States—yes, as the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] says, moral people—who have a prejudice against being married by ministers of the gospel. It is not necessary for me to say that I do not share in any such opinion, but it exists; and in a country like ours, where there is no union of church and state and no interference by the Government with religious opinions, it is eminently proper that in this District, which belongs to all the people, there should be an absence of anything like religious legislation.

In all the States of the Union civil magistrates can perform the marriage ceremony as well as ministers of the gospel. In the State of Missouri we have a very stringent statute which requires justices of the peace or judges of courts of record, who can perform the marriage ceremony, to make return to the recorder of the county, who keeps a book in which a record of all marriages is kept, and it is an indictable offense for these civil magistrates to fail to make such return, because evidence of marriage and legitimacy of children and of descent in a District 10 miles square, where there can be only a limited number of civil magistrates, practically one city, for this District is rapidly becoming the city of Washington, there can be no sort of difficulty about a certificate from the civil magistrates.

Besides that, I make the general remark that it has been the policy of all civilized and Christian countries to facilitate marriages, to encourage marriages, and it has been considered as against the welfare of the state to throw any obstacle in the way of marriage. Therefore, instead of closing the functions of the civil magistrates to the performance of this ceremony, we ought to encourage it and give to every citizen of this country who is to be married in this District the privilege of going before a justice of the peace or a judge of a court of record, as he can now do in any State of the Union.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

Mr. FAULKNER. I understand there is an understanding that it shall be taken up after the routine business is concluded to-morrow morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

GAINESVILLE, M'ALESTER AND ST. LOUIS RAILROAD COMPANY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 879) to amend an act entitled "An act to grant to the Gainesville, McAlester and St. Louis Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory."

The amendment of the House of Representatives was, in line 10 of the enrolled bill, to strike out the word "three" and insert "two."

Mr. CHILTON. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 1889) granting an honorable discharge to F. L. Taylor from December 2, 1894, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 5286) providing for disposal of lands lying within the Fort Klamath Hay Reservation, not included in the Klamath Indian Reservation, in Oregon, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. 5382) to authorize the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Memphis Railroad Company to extend its line of railroad into the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

COLUMBIA HOSPITAL FOR WOMEN.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. FAULKNER a director, on the part of the Senate, of the Columbia Hospital for Women, to fill the vacancy caused by the expiration of his term as director.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HALE. I move to take up the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

Mr. CALL. It is just 2 o'clock. I hope the Chair will lay the unfinished business before the Senate before that is done, and then I will give way.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to that, of course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution reported by Mr. MORGAN from the Committee on Foreign Relations, in reference to the war in Cuba.

Mr. HALE. Let that be informally laid aside in order that the appropriation bill may be taken up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be so ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to make the request that when the appropriation bill is concluded, if there be time for that purpose, we shall go to the Calendar for the consideration of private pension bills favorably reported by the Committee on Pensions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HILL. I simply should like to move another bill and I do not want to be foreclosed; that is all. Why not take up the unobjected cases upon the Calendar? Is there any objection to that course?

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator insists upon that I shall gracefully yield, but I would much rather have the pension bills passed, which would take a very short time. We have been in the habit of doing that in former Congresses. We have not had that privilege as yet during the present session.

Mr. HILL. I shall not object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire, and it is so ordered.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4960) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the amendments of the committee be considered as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 12, line 19, after the word "Singapore," to insert "Cape Town (Africa)," and in line 21, before the word "thousand," to strike out "thirty" and insert "thirty-three"; so as to make the clause read:

Consuls-general at Apia, Constantinople, Dresden, Guayaquil, Frankfort, Ottawa, Rome, St. Petersburg, Singapore, Cape Town (Africa), and St. Gall, at $3,000 each, $33,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 4, to increase the total of the appropriations for salaries of consuls-general under Schedule B from $102,000 to $106,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 6, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-one" and insert "seventeen"; so as to make the clause read:

For salaries of consuls, vice-consuls, and commercial agents, $417,000, as follows, namely:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 16, after the word "Nagasaki," to strike out "(and Osaka and Hiogo)" and insert "and Osaka and Hiogo"; so as to make the clause read:

Consuls at Nagasaki and Osaka and Hiogo.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 21, after the word "Barbados," to strike out "Cape Town (Africa)."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, after line 2, to insert:

INSPECTION OF CONSULATES.

To provide for the expenses of an inspection of consulates to be made by officers of the Government, such officers not to receive any compensation in addition to their regular salaries, which shall continue to be paid to them during the period of their employment in this special service, $10,000, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has an amendment to submit from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORGAN. On page 3, after line 17, I move to insert, under the direction of the Committee on Foreign Relations:

For secretary of legation to Liberia, $1,500.

Mr. HALE. There is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Perhaps I had better state that they have neither clerk nor secretary at the legation in Liberia and that the post is getting to be more and more important every day. In fact all our interests in Africa are getting to be very important now. The Secretary of State has recommended the sum of $1,500 as the amount to be appropriated for this purpose.

Mr. HALE. I think the amendment is right.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair). The amendment will be again read.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. HALE. The Secretary of State recommends it and the Committee on Foreign Relations reports it unanimously.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I have no further amendments, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Maine to line 121. The total should be made $379,000, should it not, the Senate having just added $1,500?

Mr. HALE. Yes; I move that amendment. I am obliged to the Chair for suggesting it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, that amendment will be agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE submitted the following conference report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4321) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 5, 6, 15, 20, and 31.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 9, 11, 12, 13, 14, 18, 19, 21, 22, 24, 25, 27, 28, 29, 30, 32, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, and 62, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"To open Jupiter Inlet, in Florida, for the passage of boats and small vessels, to be expended under the direction of the Chief of Engineers, $500."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 17, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment insert "$25,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment insert "$9,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 26, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment insert "$3,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed in the amended paragraph insert "$400"; and the Senate agree to the same.

EUGENE HALE,
W. B. ALLISON,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. G. CANNON,
S. A. NORTHWAY,
JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the agreement of the conference in regard to the Jupiter Inlet provision be again read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"To open Jupiter Inlet, in Florida, for the passage of boats and small vessels, to be expended under the direction of the Chief of Engineers, $500."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Mr. HALE. The only difference is that the conference committee made it an absolute appropriation instead of taking it out of another appropriation.

Mr. CHANDLER. May I ask the Senator from Maine a question? What is the amendment from which the Senate conferees propose to recede entirely? I think there is only one which it abandons entirely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 5, 6, 15, 20, and 31.

Mr. CHANDLER. Those are the amendments concerning which I desire information.

Mr. HALE. Those are amendments in relation to the Mexican boundary and a report of a scientific nature relating to that exploration. The House conferees insisted strongly upon the appropriation being left as it came from that body, and not being willing to yield, and the Senate conferees, not believing the appropriations absolutely essential upon this bill, gave it up.

Mr. CHANDLER. That explanation covers all the items where the Senate receded entirely?

Mr. HALE. It covers those items, 5, 6, and 7, whatever the numbers are.

Mr. PASCO. I rose to make an inquiry in reference to an amendment that was reported by the committee with reference to the naval station at Key West. Four thousand dollars was appropriated for a coaling shed. I should like to ask if that amendment still remains in the bill, or whether it was affected by the action of the conference?

Mr. HALE. That amendment goes out, on the understanding that it will be placed upon the regular deficiency appropriation bill, it not being an urgent deficiency. The appropriation was for $10,000, and the Secretary reports that he could get no bid for less than $14,000, and that, therefore, there would be no use to attempt to expend the $10,000. No objection was made to the item except that it did not, perhaps, properly belong upon this bill. I can say to the Senator from Florida that it will be considered in the next bill.

Mr. PASCO. The purpose, I understand, is to raise the amount from $10,000 to $14,000.

Mr. HALE. To $14,000.

Mr. PASCO. And the action of the conference by the rejection of the amendment now will not affect that purpose?

Mr. HALE. No; it is not a begun work; nothing has been done about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the report.

The report was concurred in.

WAR IN CUBA.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the special order be executed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will now proceed to the consideration of pension bills on the Calendar in view of the unanimous agreement.

Mr. CALL. The unfinished business is the Cuban resolution. That was made the unfinished business by uanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That resolution was laid temporarily aside in order that the Senate might take up some pension bills.

Mr. CALL. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Pensions to state how many pension bills there are and what length of time their consideration will occupy.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will state to the Senator from Florida that there are between 50 and 60 private pension bills on the Calendar. We may not complete them all to-day. I have not consulted the Senator from Florida, but I think the general feeling among the friends of the Cuban resolution is that it shall go over until to-morrow and be taken up early to-morrow. Of course I have no disposition to do anything that is hostile toward that resolution.

Mr. CALL. I am very anxious to have the Cuban resolution considered. I think it is very important that we should have action upon it at the earliest possible date.

Mr. GALLINGER. This is the first opportunity, I will say to the Senator, that we have had in the present Congress to consider the pension bills, and I am sure that he will not interpose an objection. It will not take a great while.

Mr. CALL. Very well; I will agree that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for that purpose, but after that I shall insist on the unfinished business being proceeded with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pension bills will be considered without prejudice to the Cuban resolution.

Mr. MORGAN subsequently said: I desire to give notice that to-morrow at 2 o'clock I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the regular order of business, which is some resolutions reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations in reference to Cuba.

Mr. CHANDLER. Are we to understand from the Senator from Alabama or the Senator from Florida that the Cuban resolutions will not be taken up this afternoon?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I ask unanimous consent that no other business be done this afternoon after the special order is executed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? If none, it is so ordered.

Mr. VILAS. One moment. I suppose that agreement does not have any reference to an executive session.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will except an executive session.

Mr. TELLER. Why should not we take up the Calendar, if we get to it?

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to my colleague to except the Calendar and executive business.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I will make the request that no other business be done to-day after the special order is executed except the Calendar of unobjected cases and executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate hears the agreement proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire. Is there objection? ["Agreed!"]

Mr. CALL. The agreement is made with the understanding that the Cuban resolution shall continue to be the regular order?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes; to be taken up to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Cuban resolution will come up as the unfinished business to-morrow at 2 o'clock. The Senate will now proceed to the consideration of pension bills, and then unobjected cases on the Calendar, and the consideration of executive business will follow, if desired.

Mr. CHANDLER. And no other business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And no other business is to be transacted to-day. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. The pension bills on the Calendar will be proceeded with.

Mr. HOAR. The pension bills are all in accordance with one formula, "That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll," etc. It would be a great relief to the clerks and a great saving of time if the name of the beneficiary and the amount of the pension should alone be read, instead of the formal reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The clerks will be directed to so read the bills, if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Towne, late of Company G, Eighth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month, in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is a clerical error in the bill. In line 6, I move to strike out the word "Eighth" and insert "Ninth"; so that it will read, "Ninth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry."

Mr. ALLEN. I move to amend by striking out "twelve" and inserting "twenty-four."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 11, before the word "dollars," it is proposed to strike out "twelve," the amendment reported by the committee, and insert in lieu thereof "twenty-four."

Mr. GALLINGER. As I understand it, the beneficiary of the bill is a dependent and an invalid daughter. The committee have reported three cases of this kind during the present session, and they have fixed the rate at $12 per month. The other two have passed, and one of them has become a law. The cases are on all fours; the circumstances and conditions precisely the same; and I trust the Senator will not insist upon increasing the rate in this particular case. If they could all be increased to $24 per month, I certainly should not object.

I will say about this class of cases that, when I was a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions of another body, we had a rule or custom of allowing this class of invalid and dependent children $18 per month. I undertook to get one through in the last Congress, but the other body insisted upon reducing it to $10 per month, and it passed the Senate in that form. As I say, we have in this Congress rather established a rule in the committee of making $12 per month the rate.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator how old this girl is?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a case in which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] is especially interested, and he can state.

Mr. COCKRELL. She is over 20 years old.

Mr. ALLEN. Is she entirely dependent?

Mr. COCKRELL. Absolutely so.

Mr. ALLEN. And requires some attendance?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; she can not go about by herself, and can not do any work.

Mr. GALLINGER. I shall not resist the amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the Senator will realize the great justice of increasing this pension, and possibly, by that means, of equalizing it with some that have just been passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is a point to which I will simply call the Senator's attention, and that is, that we propose to pension the child of a soldier who has no pension under the law. It is a gratuity pure and simple, and yet I am glad to accept any suggestion of the Senator that tends to equalization of pensions.

Mr. ALLEN. In reply to the Senator, I desire to say that the records in the Pension Bureau show that the children of soldiers have been pensioned by special acts of Congress for a year or two.

Mr. GALLINGER. Undoubtedly; but not in accordance with the general law.

Mr. ALLEN. If this young lady is blind and entirely dependent, she can not get along with $24 a month.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is entirely true.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

C. E. PHILBROOK.

The bill (S. 739) granting an increase of pension to C. E. Philbrook, widow of Alvah Philbrook, major of Twenty-fourth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty-five," and after the word "receives," in line 9, at the end of the bill, to insert:

Provided, That no claim for arrears shall be allowed by reason of the passage of this act.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of C. E. Philbrook, widow of Alvah Philbrook, major of Twenty-fourth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, and pay her a pension of $25 per month, the same to be in lieu of the pension she now receives: Provided, That no claim for arrears shall be allowed by reason of the passage of this act.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Pensions why this pension is proposed to be reduced from $30 to $25 a month?

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin. As I reported the bill, I can give the information to the Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. I shall be glad to get it.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin. Mrs. Philbrook is the widow of Captain Philbrook, who was killed at the battle of Franklin. He had at the time a major's commission in his pocket from the governor of his State, and he had been acting major for six months previous to his death. The committee thought that the widow was entitled to the pension that a major's widow gets, which, I believe, is $25 a month. So the amount was reduced from $30 to $25 a month on my suggestion.

Mr. ALLEN. As the author of the bill does not want any more than $25 a month, I certainly can not ask for any more; but I can not resist the temptation of making the remark that the line of distinction between a brevet major, or an embryo major, and a lieutenant-colonel or a colonel seems to be very broad in these bills.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin. With the consent of the committee I will withdraw the amendment and let the amount stand at $30 a month, if that is the desire of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ALLEN. I think it ought to be $30.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin. Then I withdraw the amendment, with the assent of the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. The amendment can not be withdrawn, but it can be nonconcurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment reported by the committee, before the word "dollars" to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty-five."

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on agreeing to the last amendment reported by the committee, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The committee report to add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That no claim for arrears shall be allowed by reason of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM LORING SPENCER.

The bill (S. 1699) for the relief of William Loring Spencer was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of William Loring Spencer, widow of George E. Spencer, late colonel First Regiment Alabama Cavalry, at $50 per month.

Mr. GALLINGER. I see that the Secretary very properly hesitated when he read "William Loring Spencer, widow of George E. Spencer," but notwithstanding that, the lady was christened "William," and that is her name.

I want to make a statement concerning this particular case, inasmuch as I have promised to do so to certain parties who are very deeply interested in it, one of them an ex-Senator.

The committee have reported this bill giving Mrs. Spencer $50 a month? Her husband had a distinguished service as an officer in the Army, as I remember, having the title, or the brevet title, at least, of brigadier-general. He was brevetted brigadier-general to date from March 13, 1865, for gallant and meritorious services during the campaign through Georgia and the Carolinas.

General Spencer had letters of commendation from General Vandever, from General Kilpatrick, from Major-General Dodge, from Major-General Sherman, and from Secretary of War Stanton.

He was a member of this body for twelve years, as I remember it, from the State of Alabama, and friends of his have said to me that they thought this allowance, Mrs. Spencer being in absolute destitution, ought to be $75 per month, and I rise to move an amendment making the rate $75 instead of $50.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 8, before the word "dollars," it is proposed to strike out "fifty" and insert "seventy-five"; so as to read: "$75 per month."

Mr. BERRY. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire what is the pension of the widow of a colonel under the general law?

Mr. GALLINGER. Thirty dollars a month.

Mr. BERRY. We have passed a number of bills to-day giving, I believe, $50 a month in such cases.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; $75 in some cases, and $100 in others.

Mr. BERRY. Have these increases been proposed because of the destitution of these widows over and above the general line of widows of colonels?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the committee and Congress have been governed by more than one consideration in this class of cases. First, the unusual service of the officer has been taken into account, if it has been unusual; next, the destitution of the widow has been a consideration; and I will say frankly to the Senator from Arkansas—because I would not deceive him if I could, and I certainly could not deceive him in this matter—that my motion is made somewhat upon sentimental considerations, in view of the fact that this particular officer had been a member of this body for twelve years, and left a widow in utter destitution. It, in other words, puts this case upon all fours with the case that first passed the Senate at this session of Congress, that of Brigadier-General Cogswell of Massachusetts, he having been a member of the House of Representatives for a long time, and there being perhaps a little sentiment in that.

I will say in reference to this case—and I am not going to urge it very strongly—that I have made this motion rather in behalf of men whom I regard very highly and who have made a special plea in this case.

I will say further that this is a very meritorious case, both so far as the service of the soldier was concerned and so far as the destitution of the widow is concerned. If the amendment does not pass, I have no objection; but I shall vote for it myself in view of the considerations which I have presented.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I realize how difficult it is for one who comes from the section of the country I do to make any objection whatever to the passage of pension bills. I realize furthermore that it is resented, when made by one who was on the other side of the controversy, as an effort to deprive the Union soldiers of that to which they conceive they are entitled, but it does seem to me that it is a great injustice, when the general law says that the widow of a colonel shall receive $30 a month, that the widows of particular officers shall be picked out here and given $50, $75, and $100 per month. There ought to be some uniformity in regard to these pensions.

It can not be said that this officer was more meritorious or that he rendered better services than thousands of other officers. Then why should his widow be given $75 per month, and others only $30 or $50, as the case may be? It seems to me it is unjust, and it is unfair.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] a few days ago made a speech here on this subject, and he convinced me, at least, if I had not already been before convinced, that the widows of privates, so far as pensions are concerned, should be put on an equality with the widows of officers, and I say to-day that there can be no reason to the contrary. I realize that in the case of an officer, while war is going on, in order to get the best service, the Government is obliged to pay a larger sum, but a pension is given for the support of the person drawing it, and it is even more necessary in the case of the widow of a private, because the private leaves his widow in a more helpless condition than the officer leaves his.

In addition to that, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] states as another reason why the pension in this particular case should be given that the husband of this lady was at one time a United States Senator. Is it a fair reason, is it a real reason, why this Government should pay that widow more because her husband had been a member of this body than should be paid to a man who was not so fortunate or unfortunate, as the case may be, as to have been a member of the Senate? Because he was a member of the Senate should his widow have more than the widow of a soldier equally meritorious? It seems to me that is an unjust reason and unfair reason, and while the Senator says it is actuated by sentiment, sentiment is very well when you are dealing with your own money; but when we are dealing with the money of the people of the United States, and trust money, I do not believe we have a right or that it is fair and just to take other people's money and pay it out and give it to parties on sentiment.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. BERRY. Of course, I say this in a general way. I realize and understand that it is utterly impossible that anything I can say can defeat any character of pension bill that may be brought here. I have tried it for years and years, but it goes on. This Congress has expended $140,000,000 already under the general appropriation act, but, not content with that, the Calendar is crowded from session to session with bills for increases and for new parties and with special acts. One or two were reported this morning to pension the dependent child of a soldier, and if it continues, the pension roll, at the end of forty years from the close of the war, will continue to grow instead of decreasing.

In the case of any soldier who served in the war and was wounded in the line of his duty I would not cast a vote against giving him a fair and reasonable pension, but it seems to me that where pensions are given by special act it is unjust, unequal, and unfair, and when given, as the reason here is given, because the husband of the woman happened to be a United States Senator, it is not such a reason as should control this body.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Arkansas is one of the most kindhearted men in this body, and I think one of the most fair-minded, and he will do me the justice to amend his remarks, I think, and not insist that I gave that as the reason. I gave it as one reason.

Mr. BERRY. Not as the sole reason, but as one of the reasons.

Mr. GALLINGER. I said it was sentimental to that extent, and it is. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that if General Spencer had died while he was a member of this body, sentiment would have given his widow his pay for the remainder of his term. There is no law for doing that; it is pure and unadulterated sentiment and nothing else. Sentiment does enter into these matters. If the Senator should die to-morrow his widow would be granted the remainder of his salary for the term to which he was recently elected, as I remember the practice.

Mr. BERRY. No, I think——

Mr. GALLINGER. Or for one year, perhaps.

Mr. SHERMAN. For one year.

Mr. GALLINGER. Five thousand dollars.

Mr. BERRY. Those who have been here a little longer than the Senator from New Hampshire know that I have invariably, on all occasions, voted against giving the widow of any Senator or Member a year's salary after his death. I have said on a former occasion, I have said it more than once in this body, that if that was to be the rule it ought to be inserted in the law, and let it be so understood before Senators and Members were elected; that it was unjust and unfair, and simply giving away the people's money, where it was put into an appropriation bill when the law did not exist. If Congress believes that the widow of a Senator or a Member should have a year's salary after his death, then it ought to be put into the general law, so that the whole country would understand it and Congress would be held responsible, and it should not be put into an appropriation bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Probably the Senator has never offered an amendment to the law touching that matter.

Mr. BERRY. I have voted against it upon various occasions. I fought against giving it to the widows of Supreme Court judges. I fought against giving it to Senators' widows, and have voted against it on the yeas and nays. I never offered the other amendment, because I did not believe it ought to be the law, but I say if it is going to be done that would be the fair way to do it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no doubt that the Senator has been consistent in that matter, and I simply called attention to it to show him that sentiment in this body is not entirely confined to the granting of pensions. It is a rule that I think is never departed from in this body that if an employee dies his widow is granted, as I remember it, one-half a year's salary, and there is a case on the Calendar of that kind which will undoubtedly be passed when it is reached.

I am not going to argue this case at length. I do not propose, while I chance to be the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, to be drawn into any angry discussion of pension legislation. I stated frankly, openly, and without qualification why I suggested this amendment, and I shall have no fault to find if the Senate votes against it. I trust that the Senate will vote the amendment into the bill, and I do think that the fact that this woman is the widow of a United States Senator and that she is in utter destitution does carry a little weight in the matter.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I would have been entirely satisfied with a pension of $600 a year to Mrs. Spencer, and I am quite satisfied with the proposition of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions to increase it to $75 a month. I have sentimental reasons for supporting the amendment that I may as well state.

I knew Colonel Spencer, afterwards brevetted as brigadier-general; I know the service he performed, and it was a very interesting and important service to the country. There was in the State of Alabama, as I happen to know by my personal experience, a large number of Union people. I became acquainted with them during the war. They were not the people who inhabited the Tennessee Valley about Tuscumbia and Decatur and Huntsville, but they were people who lived in the hills; and when we retreated from the Tennessee River, in order to meet General Bragg's advance by the way of Chattanooga and through Cumberland Gap into Kentucky, there followed me, I should think, 500 people from those hills.

Colonel Spencer went into those hills and organized a military force devoted to the Union, and furnished a rallying point for the element of which I speak. They were not the individuals of whom I spoke as following the Union Army, but a class resembling them—Union people who occupied the mountains south of the Tennessee River in the broken region between that and the rivers that flow into the Gulf of Mexico. He rendered a most important service. As I said, he went into that region and organized a regiment of Alabama Unionists and furnished a nucleus for the Union people who lived in that particular region.

He rendered important service, valuable service; and it was rendered at a time, too, when there was great doubt as to the direction much of that population would take. They were surrounded by opposing influences; but they clung to their faith in the Union of the States. Colonel Spencer organized a regiment of that class of people and he furnished a nucleus and protected them to that extent. To that extent, therefore, this strikes me as being a sentimental amendment. As I said, I should have been satisfied with the original amount, but as the amendment is proposed and as it is opposed it occurs to me that I now see reasons why it should be made a special case in view of the conditions that prevailed at the time when he entered Alabama to organize that regiment.

Mr. President, I wish to state another thing, too, that has had influence with me. Every gentleman present, whatever part he may have played in the late unpleasantness, as we sometimes pleasantly term it, is aware that in the beginning of the struggle there was much doubt as to what were the duties of citizens. Men, right-minded men, hesitated as to the course they would pursue. I have always felt that the men who took ground distinctly and positively—and I am not excepting those who were prompt and earnest in opposition to my views, but I say the men who acted promptly and earnestly at the beginning of the struggle, and thus aided in guiding public opinion, are to be remembered as being the most valuable men who took part in that great civil controversy.

Colonel Spencer earnestly took part very early in the struggle. He was a young man full of energy, full of ambition, and his capacity was such that it finally brought him into this body. I do not know that he came into the Senate regularly, but I feel about the men who came from the reconstructed States very much as I felt when I went to New Orleans in 1876. I learned when I went to New Orleans that there was an element, largely from the North, who had seized that great city, and had conquered that country and held the Mississippi River by a grasp, with all its vast productions. I said to myself, "This may not be honest, but men must have capacity who have been able to win such triumphs." Colonel Spencer came into this body after having served his country in the manner I have indicated, and in that he evinced his capacity and his energy and his force. It was the same energy and force that he employed when he was organizing those mountaineers in Alabama and furnishing them the means of defense as well as a nucleus for organization.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Pensions if there is a written report accompanying this bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. There is.

Mr. ALLEN. What special reasons are set forth in the report in support of the bill at the sum of $75 a month.

Mr. GALLINGER. Nothing beyond what I have stated. I could not make it any stronger if I tried. The bill was introduced at $50, and it passed the committee at $50, and was so reported. There was not any discussion in committee on the matter at all.

Mr. ALLEN. On the 14th of last month, in discussing the bill granting a pension to the widow of the late Brevet Brigadier-General Cogswell, I got into some difficulty with the Committee on Pensions and some other Senators for opposing that bill at the sum of $75 a month. I thought then, and I think now, that $50 a month under the circumstances is ample compensation for that lady as compared with the pensions that have been granted to the widows of like soldiers during the last twenty-five years by special act of Congress. I was so thoroughly impressed with that fact that I took occasion to address a letter to the Commissioner of Pensions, asking him to furnish me a list of the colonels and brevet brigadier-generals, because there is only the distinction of rank and not of pay between those, whose widows have been pensioned by special act of Congress from the close of the war until the present time.

I now want to call the attention of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire to some of these cases. This list goes no higher than the rank of brigadier-general. There are pensions granted to the widows of major-generals beyond these.

I find the first case to be that of Mrs. Juliet Opie H. Ayers, widow of Romeyn Beck Ayers, colonel of the Second United States, and brevet brigadier-general of volunteers. She was pensioned by act of Congress June 3, 1890, at the rate of $15 a month. I do not know much about General Ayers. He seems to have held the rank of a brevet brigadier-general, and he seems to have received an honorable discharge from the Army. I have no doubt in my own mind that he discharged his duty faithfully, and bravely, and well, and intelligently as he was called upon to discharge it during his service in the Army.

The next one I find is Harriet M. Bailey, widow of William P. Bailey, colonel of the Second Delaware Volunteers, who receives a pension of $30 a month. The next is Mary Bailey, widow of Joseph Bailey, brevet brigadier-general of volunteers, who receives a pension of $30 a month. Emma Biddle, widow of Charles J. Biddle, receives a pension of $45 a month, under an act of Congress of February 13, 1889. Emily B. Bidwell, widow of Daniel B. Bidwell, brigadier-general of volunteers, receives a pension of $50 a month and her daughter a pension of $12 a month. So this list runs through. There are 63 of these pension cases, I think. In a great majority of the cases the rate of pension is $30 a month, and there are but two above $50. Caroline S. Webster, widow of Fletcher Webster, colonel of the Twelfth Massachusetts Volunteers, was pensioned by act of Congress, June 28, 1879, at $100 a month, and I presume there was some sentiment in that pension. Henrietta O. Whittaker, widow of Walter C. Whittaker, brigadier-general of volunteers, was pensioned by act of Congress, August 15, 1890, at $100 a month. All the rest run from $15 a month up to $50 as the highest, and, as I stated, in the great majority of cases the rate is $30 a month.

Mr. President, if there is sentiment in this matter (and I admit there is much sentiment in so far as I am concerned, because I was impressionable at that particular period in the history of the country), let me call the attention of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Pensions to a few cases that ought to have embraced a little bit more sentiment than appears to have characterized the passage of some of these acts. I call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to the case of Annie A. Hays, widow of Alexander Hays, brigadier-general of volunteers, who was pensioned July 14, 1870, at $50 a month by special act of Congress. I call the honorable Senator's attention to the fact that there was no brigadier-general in the Army during the history of our late civil strife who won greater fame or who rendered greater or more brilliant service to the cause of the Union than did Gen. Alexander Hays. Yet his widow was pensioned at $50 a month.

And let me call attention to another conspicuous case. Mrs. Meagher, widow of Thomas Francis Meagher, brigadier-general of volunteers, was pensioned by act of Congress, February 22, 1887, at $50 a month. It was notorious in this country during the days of the war that Thomas Francis Meagher was one of the greatest Irish generals we had upon the side of the Union. He rendered most conspicuous services. He was a great man intellectually, a man of great qualifications, who discharged his full duty in the cause of the Union from the opening to the closing of the war. Yet his widow receives but $50 a month.

I call attention to another case that my honorable friend, the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER], will recognize. I call attention to the case of Martha Ann Wallace, widow of W. H. H. Wallace, brigadier-general of volunteers, pensioned by special act of Congress, July 23, 1868, at $50 a month.

Mr. PALMER. A gallant fellow.

Mr. ALLEN. The honorable Senator says he was a gallant fellow. He was killed at the head of his troops at Shiloh. He was a very great man, a man whose life gave promise of standing at the head of one of the great armies of the North if he had lived. He was a man of military genius, a man whose record as a soldier and whose competency and qualifications as a soldier could not be questioned. And yet his widow receives a pension of only $50 a month.

I would not draw any invidious distinction between the widows of these deceased soldiers and comrades of mine, nor would I draw any distinction between their services that would look like a reflection upon the one and an undue laudation of the other, because each of these men no doubt performed his duty well at the time and under the circumstances under which he was called into service, and perhaps would have performed greater and more brilliant service than he did if the opportunity had been afforded him. I call attention to these cases—and there are others equally as conspicuous as those I have pointed out—for the purpose of showing that there has been an irregularity in the granting of pensions to the widows of the same class of officers in times past, and that some uniformity ought now to be established.

In glancing over this letter of the Commissioner of Pensions, I came across another conspicuous name. Louise A. Starkweather, widow of John C. Starkweather, colonel of Wisconsin Volunteers and brigadier-general of volunteers, was pensioned by act of March 2, 1891, at $60 a month. There was another conspicuous example of a great soldier——

Mr. PALMER. He was a fine soldier.

Mr. ALLEN. My honorable friend from Illinois says he was a fine soldier.

Mr. PALMER. I knew him well. He served with my command.

Mr. ALLEN. He says that he knew him well and he was a part of his command. Why was not this widow's pension raised to $75 a month? I do not want to be understood as being opposed to the granting of just pensions to the widows of meritorious soldiers. I believe in it, although there has been an attempt among a certain class of people since my discussion of the Cogswell case here last month to put me in the attitude of antagonizing the granting of just pensions.

Mr. President, I believe every man who gave his services to his country, who offered his life to his country, and who performed his duty meritoriously and well, should be recognized equally with every other man who did the same thing. That has been my position throughout my life. It will be my position the remainder of my life. For when a man gives his life to his country, whether he be in an arena where he shines conspicuously as a leader of men, or whether he be in an arena of mud and dust and fever, exposed to the inclemency of the weather and carrying his musket and his knapsack and discharging his duty to his country as faithfully as he can, what more can any man do than to offer his life in defense of the flag of his country? And where comes the spirit which we see manifested, especially in this Chamber, from time to time, that seems to say that because some man by the fortunes of politics or by some other fortuitous circumstances was made a leader of men for the time being, therefore, the great Creator of man had made some distinction between men of the same race and that distinction must exist under institutions like ours, which recognize the political equality of all men, when the great armies of which they were members have been mustered out of the service of the Government and they have returned to the peaceful walks of life?

Mr. President, I am a democrat, not a Democrat in the sense of belonging to the Democratic party, as a distinguished associate of ours has frequently announced, but I am a democrat in the broader and more comprehensive and catholic sense of the term. I believe every human being who walks upon the face of this earth, male or female, who discharges his or her duties conscientiously, reverently, in the fear and sight of God, in the station in which he or she may be placed, is the equal politically, naturally, and socially of every other man or woman.

I want to denounce, as far as I am capable of using the English language, the spirit that has grown up in this country of making unwarranted and invidious distinctions among men and women. We would suppose at times when we listen to orations upon deceased brigadier-generals and colonels that there was nothing in the late army—and I say it with a spirit of entire reverence—below the rank of a brigadier-general. In these degenerate days it is very hard to find a man who is willing to admit that he was a private soldier, because the fact that he was a private soldier seems, under the influences of modern society, to carry the imputation that he was not much of a man.

What would have become of this country in the late struggle if there had not been 2,500,000 honest men who came from their workshops, from their offices, from all the humble walks of life and shouldered their muskets and marched to victory under the leadership of many of these distinguished majors and brigadier-generals?

Mr. TURPIE. The man with the musket was a hero.

Mr. ALLEN. My honorable friend, the Senator from Indiana, says the man with the musket was a hero. I am perfectly willing to divide honors with those gentlemen so far as I am concerned and so far as concerns those with whom I associated during that period. It was my fortune and sometimes my misfortune to march with some of those gentlemen on long, weary, muddy, and disagreeable marches, and to participate in skirmishes and battles. Some of them were great men; some of them were competent and brilliant men. Many of them, however, were not worth the clothing they wore. The same is true of the private soldiers in the ranks. Out of a regiment embracing a thousand men you never could get to exceed 500 of them in fighting contact with the enemy. Some were sick, some were detailed, some were stragglers, some managed by hook or by crook to get out of the road of danger, and about one-half of the whole number on the roll bore the brunt of the battle.

Now, thirty years after the great conflict has ended, should we set up this standard of distinction in the United States Congress and say that one man, because he wore epaulets upon his shoulders during that struggle, receiving the honor and the pay incident to his rank, is superior to his more humble companion who trudged after him in the ranks weeks and months and years, fighting the great battles, winning victories, and sometimes losing a battle?

Mr. President, the distinction not only is not real, but it is an insult to the great rank and file of that Army. It is an open insult thrown into the faces of the great masses of the American people. We are a Republic in this country. The rights of the private soldier and the rights of the humblest citizen in this land are as sacred under our form of government, under our fundamental and statutory laws, under the protecting folds of the American flag, as are the rights of the most exalted and the most accomplished citizen; and we do ourselves injustice when we encourage this invidious distinction.

When the war was over, when the armies disbanded, when those men returned to the peaceful pursuits of life, the inequality that was forced upon them in consequence of the necessity of military discipline disappeared; the relations as they existed before that great event were reestablished. Whenever I hear the honorable Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] plead the cause of one of those brigadier-generals or his widow I can not help but think how many thousands and hundreds of thousands of poor, careworn widows of private soldiers there are in this country who must furnish evidence which would be sufficient to convict a man of a crime beyond a reasonable doubt before they are permitted to take out of the Treasury of the United States the pittance of $8 a month. Some persons can ride to the Pension Office in their carriages and draw $100 or $200 a month, and live in luxury. Another, equally meritorious, but the widow of a private soldier or the widow of a noncommissioned officer, goes in a well-worn and faded calico dress and almost without shoes, and, getting upon her knees, must beg for the pittance of eight or twelve dollars a month. It is wrong, and it ought not to be encouraged.

The time has come when this distinction must be wiped out. In my judgment no Senator in this body will gain political preferment, if that is what he seeks (and I have sometimes suspected that even in this Chamber political motives control the action of Senators), who undertakes to force upon the country an unnatural distinction like this. When the general went to the war with the increased pay and the increased honor that his position brought him, and his humble neighbor went to the ranks carrying a musket to discharge his duty, and both of them gave to the country what they had, they should now stand alike upon the pay rolls of the Government. They should occupy the same position in the hearts of their countrymen and in the history of the nation. Their widows should stand side by side as the honorable widows of men who yielded up their lives in defense of the flag of their nation.

I desire to insert the letter of the Commissioner of Pensions in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

Letter from the Commissioner of Pensions, transmitting a list, compiled from the Statutes at Large of the United States, showing the names of widows of colonels, brevet brigadier-generals, and brigadier-generals of the volunteers who are in receipt of pensions under special acts.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., January 31, 1896.

SIR: In compliance with your letter of January 15, 1896, requesting information relative to certain pensioners under special acts of Congress, I transmit herewith a list, compiled from the Statutes at Large of the United States, showing the names of widows of colonels, brevet brigadier-generals, and brigadier-generals of the volunteers who are in receipt of pensions under special acts.

It is proper to add that the list is not believed to be complete, for the reason that many special acts do not give the rank or service of the soldier on account of whose service the pension is granted. The list, however, is as complete as can be furnished by this Bureau from the Statutes at Large.

Trusting that the information may be of service to you, I am,

Very respectfully,

WM. LOCHREN, Commissioner.

Hon. WILLIAM V. ALLEN,
United States Senate.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, in reference to this bill, it is a matter of duty that I should say a few words. The widow who is to be the recipient of the pension proposed to be granted is the daughter of a citizen of Florida whom I knew in my early life. I happen to have some information in regard to the peculiar circumstances which would constitute this an exception even to the rule proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], if it were a correct rule, which I do not think it is.

The husband, General Spencer, for whose service the pension is to be granted to his widow, lived for some years in a condition of feebleness and inability to perform any work for himself, and was dependent upon his wife, I understand, and not upon the Treasury of the United States. By her exertion he was for years supported and sustained in time of sickness, and I understand from some personal knowledge of herself and her affairs that he derived from her labor and her efforts that support which was due to him from the Treasury of the United States. In consideration of this fact, if none other, the pension should be enlarged beyond that granted to others. I mention this fact because it is known better to me than to others.

Now, I wish to say a few words more. I have always considered that it was the part of the Union soldiers and the representatives of the Northern people to determine the pensions that should be granted to their soldiers and widows on account of services during the late war, and I have voted for whatever they, by the majority, said was the established sentiment and opinion of the Northern people. I am still prepared to do so. But I do not agree with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN]. It is reasonable to assume that the man who is selected by the private soldiers themselves to be in command gave something more to his country than the average private soldier did. He gave a higher degree of intelligence than did the average man in the ranks.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Florida permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. Is the Senator willing to assert that the officers had a monopoly of intelligence?

Mr. CALL. No; not a monopoly.

Mr. ALLEN. Does the Senator mean to assert that if all of them, by some mysterious power of Providence, had been taken away; there were not men in the ranks competent to perform their duties?

Mr. CALL. No. But that has nothing to do with the Senator's proposition. When the man in the ranks was chosen by the soldiers, and had the ability to perform that duty, he rendered a service greater than that of his fellows. It was greater in responsibility and greater in its requirements and its labor and self-sacrifice.

Mr. ALLEN. Why does the Senator assert that the officers had the superior intellect?

Mr. CALL. Because their comrades chose them for those places for that reason.

Mr. ALLEN. Let me call the Senator's attention to one thing. The private soldiers of the late war have succeeded in civil life to a greater extent than have the officers.

Mr. CALL. That may be, and yet it has nothing to do with the argument. I question, however, whether the Senator has any data whatever upon which to base that proposition. They were infinitely more numerous; unquestionably the number was much greater, and therefore their success is more obvious than that of the officers.

But I want to speak about this proposition. I am as much in favor of doing everything that is possible for the great masses of the people, in the individual and in the aggregate, as is anybody else; but I am not in favor of any policies or laws which will militate against the benefit of the individuals who constitute the great mass of the people. If I had the power I would give all brave and meritorious soldiers of either army unable to earn a support, and their widows and children, an adequate pension. Now, the argument of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] is just as forcible as if he were to say that the members of this body, the President of the United States and the members of his Cabinet, and the judges of the courts should be given the same pay as the workman who constructs a house or who engages in any of the useful and necessary occupations of labor. They are more necessary perhaps than the brains of the country. The intelligence of the country could not live without them, but neither can they live without the brains which their humble circumstances furnish to the country to constitute its guide and its light.

The genius and the intellect of the country come from the poor people. The private soldier becomes an officer and is chosen by private soldiers. When they are placed in position to guide and direct, manifestly an additional responsibility, an additional duty, an additional expense is imposed upon them. Unless you make the Army and Congress a plutocratic body and forbid a representative of the poor or of the privates from coming here or being an officer, how could Senators live here or officers give their time to the performance of their public duties upon the one, two, three, or four dollars a day which is the pay of the laborers of the country?

That is the proposition of the Senator. The people honor themselves when they honor their meritorious public servants. We live in a Republic where the people govern, and it is our boast and pride that the private, the poorest man is not excluded from the highest offices and the greatest responsibilities. We are a people who, in contradistinction to monarchy, to royalty, to hereditary estates, to riches, rank, and power, desire to see their representatives chosen by ourselves from the people placed in positions where they will stand equal with any others in any other Government and under any other circumstances. This is democracy, and this alone.

I do not agree with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY]. The poor man who comes here and renders faithful service to his country has a right to have his children educated; he has a right to have them appear decently and in good shape to the rest of the people of the country; and he has a right to have compensation sufficient to make provision for his family. It is to the disgrace of ourselves and our country that the descendants of Thomas Jefferson, the great light of the people, and of Madison, and of many of our other public men, who have given their services to the country, were left in the most absolute poverty. It is to our disgrace that our inefficient means of industrial education leave in a condition of destitution the children of many of the men who have rendered most important service in the cause of freedom and of the people, and who might have acquired fortunes and given comfort to their family.

No, the argument is a wrong one. The public service rendered by faithful public servants, either in the Army or in civil life, ought to be adequately rewarded, and the families of such men ought to be provided with reasonable comforts. To say that because you can not do this for all the widows of this country—I wish you could—is no argument why you should not do it so far as you can. To say that you can not do this for all the widows in the country because their husbands have rendered meritorious service, but yet not the same kind of service as others, is no argument.

The question is, does the established and necessary order of things require superior ability and guidance? Does it require that when the people charge one of their fellow-citizens with extraordinary and important duties he shall not be surrounded with the circumstances to enable him to perform those duties, and that when to the exclusion of gain to himself he has passed through life in the people's service his family shall have no provision made for them, even in the shape of the small sum of money which he would have earned in a few months? I do not agree with the argument.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words in response to those uttered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL]. His first statement was that he thought that those who served in the Union Army, or at least were in sympathy with that Army, ought to determine the amount of pensions that should be granted here, thereby inferring, I suppose, that no one who did not serve in that Army, although he is a Senator or a Member of the House of Representatives, has any right to express any opinion about it, but is simply bound to let those who were in sympathy with the Union cause determine it.

I think a great many Senators here from the South have been silent from time to time because of the very idea expressed by the Senator from Florida, that any attempt upon our part to regulate the amount of the pensions would be resented and perhaps misunderstood. But we are here as the representatives of our people. If we are not equal in all respects to every other Senator, with a perfect right and the duty incumbent upon us to vote for such bills as we think are proper and just, and against such as we think are hurtful, then we ought not to be permitted to have seats upon this floor. If we are unequal, if we have no right to express an opinion upon any matter that may become public legislation, then we never ought to have come here. As I feel, our States at least have equal rights in this Union, and if we are permitted to represent them upon this floor we are equal with every other man in every respect so far as the right to vote and to express an opinion upon any public measure is concerned.

Now, the second proposition of the Senator from Florida is that there ought to be a civil list, and that the widows and children of Senators or men who have served the public ought to be on the pension roll, or, to use his language, ought to be provided for by the Government. Mr. President, I protest against any such idea or any such proposition. The Senator says that we spend our lives in serving the public. The truth is, and everybody knows it, that there is not a man here who did not want to be here, and he would not be here unless he sought the place and thought the compensation and the honor were equal to the service he might render. Because men who seek these positions, when they are sought for by hundreds of their countrymen, are so fortunate as to secure them, is no reason why the balance of the people of the country should contribute of their means to support the wives and children of those who have been in public life.

I say that our Government, if I have understood its object and purposes, is founded upon different principles. I have been taught to believe that this is a Republic in which each man is equal before the law. I have been taught to believe that if you build up a privileged class, a class of officeholders, whose wives and daughters shall be foisted upon the Government, to be supported by the balance of the people of this nation, then we will no longer be a Republic where equality exists.

I wish to say another word or two. The Senator from Florida says it is perfectly proper that this distinction shall be made in the matter of pensions because the officers of the Army had more intelligence than the privates. That might be a reason why in time of war we should pay the officer a greater salary than the private, because the situation might be such that it would be impossible to secure the best talent of the country unless you did pay an additional price. But the pension of a widow is upon a wholly different principle. It is given to her for her support, because her husband lost his life in time of war. The man she married was an officer; it may be true that he had more intelligence than the private soldier, yet I do not believe in the theory that she, too, must be placed upon a higher plane and given an additional amount because of the higher intelligence of her husband.

As I said in the beginning, I well know that nothing I can say here would tend to defeat any pension bill, however unjust or absurd it may be; but when I sit by, day by day, and see these distinctions made; when I see one colonel's widow given $30, another $50, another $75, and all equally meritorious, while the private soldier's widow receives from eight to twelve and a half dollars, I believe it is unjust, and I believe I would not be true to myself if I did not express my objection to such legislation.

As I said a while ago, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] who reported the bill gave several reasons why this widow should receive $75, when others receive only $50. The reason to which I most objected is the one given by him that she is the widow of a United States Senator. That is no reason, no cause, sentimentally or otherwise, why this distinction should be made.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] resorts to the old practice of knocking down a man of straw instead of the real point of objection to his argument. The reason why Southern men, Confederate men, whose sympathies were against the war of the Union, have not been conspicuous in fixing the rates of compensation to be paid to Union soldiers is an obvious one. Recognizing the right and the duty of Senators, without reference to their past, to do that which seems to them best for the country, the question then arises, is it wise and proper that we, with our prejudices and animosities, after the war shall say what would be the proper compensation for those people to whom we were antagonistic?

The sentiment of the Northern people would revolt at it, and it would then have been unwise, as it is now unwise for us to endeavor to oppose that public sentiment which has a right under the circumstances to fix the compensation of their own people. If we had triumphed in our cause we should have resented opposition on the part of the Northern people to such compensation as we thought fit to prescribe to the men who had accomplished success for us.

This contention about the private soldier has nothing to do with the question. We are all private soldiers. The danger to the private soldier and to the people of this country is not from giving adequate rewards to Senators and public servants and officers; it is in the great public policies which build up a class of people so enormously rich that they alone can hold the places of power and public trust. The friend of the people, the real democrat, is he who provides for the poor man's coming into places of power and for his adequate support.

Those who seek to reduce the public servant, the poor man who has risen to position by the voice of other poor men, to such poverty that he can not perform those public services, who discriminate against him and his family in the ordinary walks of life, are not the friends of the people, are not the defenders of republican institutions, however much they may think they are. The true policy of popular government is that the representatives of the people, they whom the people select, shall be removed from the influences of wealth and power, and made independent to exercise proper judgment for the people, responsible to them, and responsible for public policies which are in their interest, and not in the interest of concentrated power and wealth and herditary influence.

Mr. President, that is the true democracy, and the only possible democracy. I do not say that officers are more intelligent than the private soldiers; I have never made that affirmation. I say that the private soldier when he selects a leader selects a man of the greatest intelligence. I say the officers selected by the people are more intelligent than the average of the private soldiers. I say that the public man in this body is more intelligent than the average of the people; he has had greater opportunity presumably, from his having the confidence of the poor people of the country who, in most cases, elevate him to power. That very fact is evidence that they consider that he is above and beyond the general average.

I am not in favor of that kind of democracy which sentences the man chosen by the people to exercise important public functions to poverty and his family to want. I have said nothing about favoring a pension for a civilian or a civil list. I am not in favor of a pension to the civil-service employees. What has the fact that a man seeks a particular place, that he wants the honor and the emoluments of a public office, to do with a public policy which shall provide a reasonable compensation and an inducement to public men to qualify themselves for public service? That has nothing more to do with the proposition of the Senator from Arkansas than it has with the North or South Pole.

The proposition is, what is the best public policy? Is it one which shall offer inducement to the poor people of this country, to the boys and the women who wish to qualify themselves for important public places, or is it one that offers them no inducement to honorable ambition? What is the best public policy? Is it to say you shall take, as the penalty of this elevation by the choice of your people, of this seeking for place, poverty and social inferiority for yourself and family—that this shall be your reward for faithful public service? Is that the kind of Government which the argument of the Senator from Arkansas demands? It is to punish merit, it is to punish honorable ambition, it is to punish faithful public service, to punish devotion to the people and to true Democracy. It is to exclude the body of the people, who are poor, who are privates, from holding office. To that kind of policy I am opposed; and if Senators on the other side and the people of the North see fit to award to their generals and the officers of their Army pensions, and to make differences between them and the mass of the soldiers, I have not one word to say in objection to it.

As to the proposition that every private soldier should have a pension, yes, and every widow, and be put in luxury for meritorious service of the 500 referred to out of the 1,000 who, as the Senator from Nebraska says, fought the battles of the country, I agree to it. I would like both them and the Confederate soldiers and their widows all to have a general's pension, if you can so manage it; but how can you do it? You can not give a great pension to every widow. You can not find out now who were the 500 who fought and the 500 who did not. The people who labor, and out of whose labor pensions are paid, can not bear such great increase of their burdens. The Senator from Nebraska can not ascertain the fact as to who were the meritorious 500 who bore the brunt of battle. He himself says that there were 500 men out of every 1,000 who were not in the thick of battle, but some of them in other duty, and some stragglers and in no duty.

Mr. ALLEN. No; I did not say so, Mr. President.

Mr. CALL. Did you not say that some were stragglers? That 500 bore the brunt of the action?

Mr. ALLEN. No; I did not say so.

Mr. CALL. I will take that back, then. I think those were the words used by the Senator, though he did not mean that, and I do not mean to impute to him any reflections on either officers or soldiers, for I have a high respect for him and for his opinions and for the Senator from Arkansas. I am discussing the reasonableness of these arguments and the public policy they advocate in this respect.

Mr. ALLEN. No; I know what I say generally. I said out of a regiment of 1,000 men that experience had proved that never to exceed more than one-half of them came in fighting contact with the enemy, that the other 500 were on detail duty or on the sick list, and some of them were straggling and at other places rather than in fighting contact with the enemy.

Mr. CALL. Then you do not want stragglers to be pensioned?

Mr. ALLEN. I never in the world would pension a straggler, if I had my way.

Mr. CALL. It is impossible to carry out the idea of the Senator from Nebraska to pension the widows of every private soldier, so that they will be in abundant comfort; but it is possible to pension those of whom we have ascertained records of distinguished and extraordinary service. And in this there is no distinction between officer and private or officers' widows and privates' widows; wherever they rendered the same service the same pensions should be awarded; but the question is, is the officer's service the same, are the duties the same as the private's, are the responsibilities the same? Is the service of a faithful public servant or officer on the same or a larger scale than that of the private citizen or soldier?

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I will make answer to the Senator from Florida. Take the widows, for instance, of two equally meritorious men, of equal intellectual capacity, of equal capacity in private life, women who are equal in their social life from girlhood to womanhood, who are equal in the literary and the other acquirements that go to make up perfect womanhood—I want to ask the Senator from Florida if, when their husbands die, he would give to one of them $50 a month and to the other $8 a month because of the distinction that existed between their husbands during their service?

I want to emphasize the statement. I can not agree with the Senator from Florida, and I am certainly surprised to see the distinguished Senator from Florida join the plutocrats in this Chamber.

Mr. CALL. Oh, no.

Mr. ALLEN. If any man has been constant, in season and out of season, during this Congress and during the Fifty-third Congress in preaching the cause of reform and the cause of the common man, that man has been the senior Senator from Florida. And now all this preaching of his is to go for naught at this time, and he wants to impress upon the Senate and upon the country that there is some kind of distinction existing between men in this country—I do not know how, and he has not explained how—and between the meritorious widows of the men who consecrated themselves, in different lines, it is true, to the cause of their country at the call of the country. Why, Mr. President, if I believed that doctrine I would expatriate myself in twenty-four hours. I would go over to Great Britain, where Queen Victoria rules supreme over the British Empire, and I do not know but that I should go to Russia, where the Emperor is the Government.

Mr. CALL. If the Senator believed that, he would go to England or to Russia, as he says; and I ask him whether he ought not to take but a dollar and a half a day for his service here, and is he not bound to decline every dollar that the Government pays him over a dollar and a half a day?

Mr. ALLEN. I am perfectly willing to enter into a contract with the Senator from Florida to take the same pay he takes. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALL. Oh, well, I would not take that. You are safe in making that proposition.

Mr. ALLEN. And I think I can earn as much here or elsewhere as can the Senator from Florida.

Mr. President, the sentiment expressed by the Senator from Florida is un-American. We are not only to have this distinction exist in military life, but it is to exist in private life, in the life of the citizen. The Senator would go further and would convert this country into an aristocracy——

Mr. CALL. Oh, no. That is what your policy would do by excluding all poor men and all privates from holding office and confining the offices to the rich.

Mr. ALLEN. With a ruling class of people, where a few men, through the influences of wealth or rank, would control the destinies of a great nation, while the great masses of our people would simply be their serfs, contributing by their labor and their taxes to the strengthening and upbuilding of that class. I am absolutely surprised and completely amazed at the attitude of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the Senator will allow me to say——

Mr. ALLEN. Let me go on.

Mr. CALL. Very well; go on.

Mr. ALLEN. Not only that, but the Senator would build up a civil list in this country——

Mr. CALL. I did not say so and I am not in favor of any such proposition.

Mr. ALLEN. So that we should have the widows and children of men in public life pensioned for their lives, like the widows and daughters of brigadier-generals, until, in the course of a few years, we should have upon the civil pension list of this country a million people. Why, Mr. President, is that Florida Democracy?

Mr. CALL. I am astonished at the Senator. He is here advocating a policy which demands that a million soldiers and their widows shall be put upon the pension list in comfort and luxury, with brigadiers' pensions, an impossible thing, and he turns around and asks me about putting a million pensioners on the civil list. I have never said that I was in favor of a civil pension list, and I am opposed to it; but the Senator has said, and he is arguing here, that every soldier and every soldier's widow, more than a million in all, shall be put away up above the present rate. If that were possible I might agree with him, but he turns around and charges upon me just what he is in favor of and has been urging here, which is impossible, and which he would not do if he had the power, and charges on me propositions which I have never stated and to which I am entirely opposed.

Mr. ALLEN. No, Mr. President; I am not unwarrantably accusing the Senator from Florida. I say that I drew distinctly from the language the Senator used the conclusion that he wanted to see pensioned the widow and the children of a man because he happened to have been in the Senate or the House of Representatives, thus discriminating in their favor as against the widow and the children of the poor men in this country who are working for a livelihood.

Mr. CALL. The Senator should always stick to the point. The Senator from Arkansas attacked the allowance of a year's salary to the widow of a Senator; I defended it and said it was right. That is nothing like a civil pension list. I again repeat, as I have constantly done, that I am opposed to pensioning Senator's widows or any civil employees' widows.

Mr. ALLEN. What was the Senator doing when he was talking about distinguished men serving their country in this Chamber?

Mr. CALL. I was arguing the point of reasonable compensation for valuable public services.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator was arguing the point that there was some distinction between those men and the men whom they represented.

Mr. CALL. The only distinction is that one renders public service and the other does not. That is all that I said, and all that is involved in the argument.

Mr. ALLEN. One renders service, so the Senator from Florida says, and the other does not; but the other is perfectly willing to do so.

Mr. CALL. I am willing to admit that.

Mr. ALLEN. I have not the slightest doubt that we can find in the State of Florida 10,000 of its citizens who would be perfectly willing to represent that great State in this Chamber.

Mr. CALL. And the same is true of Nebraska, too.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; and Nebraska, too. I know that. [Laughter.] And there are 10,000 citizens, with no disparagement to my honorable friend from Florida, who would represent that State equally as well.

Mr. CALL. Possibly better.

Mr. ALLEN. Now, what? Because we are so fortunate, perhaps, or unfortunate, as to be members of this body—and it is a question yet whether it is a fortune or a misfortune to be in this Chamber—are our widows and children to be put upon a civil list, and become a civil aristocracy in this country, as against the widows and children of the great masses of the people who have built up this magnificent and splendid Republic?

Mr. CALL. Of course not.

Mr. ALLEN. No; of course not. It does not sound right when put in proper language, does it?

Mr. CALL. You do not put it in proper language.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, what I stated a while ago I repeat at this moment. The distinction that Senators would make is between the widows and the children of brigadier-generals and the great masses of the unknown soldiers, the humble men who performed services to this country in the late war, and who will perform those services in the great war to come with Great Britain on the Monroe doctrine, because it seems to be imminent now; and I am surprised again at the Senator from Florida, and not only surprised, but I am absolutely amazed to think that the Senator from Florida would rise in his place in the Senate of the United States and say that a lieutenant had a brighter, a stronger, and a better intellect than a private soldier.

Mr. President, there were hundreds and perhaps thousands of officers who could not write their own names until some private soldier taught them how to do it; and yet the Senator rises in his place and declares to the world that the officer has a superior intellect to the man who wore the blue or the man who wore the gray.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, nothing of that sort has been said. If the Northern Army was, as the Senator has said, officered by men who could not write their names, it was an extraordinary condition of things. I am sure he does not mean this.

Mr. ALLEN. I said some of them.

Mr. CALL. We were not speaking of some. If you were speaking of some, then you were not arguing the case; but we were speaking of the mass; and I said the soldiers themselves chose one of their comrades, a private, to be their leader; and if the Senator assails their intelligence by saying that they chose the most ignorant among them, it is he that is assailing the private Union soldier and not I.

Mr. President, what the Senator has said about a civil list I deny. I said nothing about a civil list; but I said that to the widow of the public servant who sat here and labored here and did service here and died, Congress gave a year's salary, and it did right, because his people had chosen him, he had accepted, and had faithfully rendered service to the public, and dying left in most cases a family without adequate support. So I say about ths officers of the Union Army who were privates and became officers at the request of their comrades or with their consent. I take it for granted that when the patriotic and able and great President of the United States, Abraham Lincoln, who was the author of all appointments in the Army, appointed an officer, he did it either because of his proved record of superior intelligence, capacity, and bravery, or because the public sentiment and judgment of the private soldiers had selected their fellow-soldier for this more responsible position. And if the Senator says that President Lincoln and that Grant and Sherman selected for leadership men who were neither capable nor brave, it is he, and not I, who assails the Union private soldier.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska has not made any statement of the kind. I regret exceedingly to see my friend from Florida beating about the bush now and undertaking to get out of the uncomfortable position in which he has placed himself.

Mr. CALL. Oh, no; you are the one who is bushed. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN. I said that there were hundreds and thousands—perhaps I should not go any further than that—of these men who were even taught to write their own names by private soldiers, and I will say that that existed North and South, too, because it is correct.

Mr. CALL. No; not in the South.

Mr. ALLEN. And yet we are told openly in the Senate of the United States that by force of the fact that one man was an officer and the other was a private soldier, therefore there was a distinction between their intellects and their moral courage.

Mr. CALL. I must correct the Senator. I say we are told there was a difference in their service, because the private soldier of the army said so; and not because one was a colonel and the other was not.

Mr. ALLEN. He never said so, and no reasonable man upon the face of this earth ever said so honestly.

Mr. CALL. How, then, did the man get to be an officer?

Mr. ALLEN. By hook and by crook; by political influences many times.

Mr. CALL. Did President Lincoln appoint men to be officers by hook and by crook, or because of merit?

Mr. ALLEN. No; President Lincoln did not have anything to do with the appointment of many of them.

Mr. CALL. I supposed he had.

Mr. ALLEN. Most of them were appointed by the governors of the States.

Mr. CALL. Then your governors were very bad men. That is your proposition.

Mr. ALLEN. No, Mr. President; no worse than the governor of the State of Florida at the same time.

Mr. CALL. I have nothing to say about that.

Mr. ALLEN. I want to say to the Senator from Florida that he can not get away from the proposition he has laid down here, that the fact that there was a distinction in the rank of these men was conclusive and indubitable proof of a distinction in their intellectual capacity.

Mr. CALL. I said nothing of that sort.

Mr. ALLEN. Did not the Senator say that there was a distinction in the intellectual capacity of the officers and men?

Mr. CALL. I deny the statement entirely. I have never said, and do not believe, that because you call one man "colonel" and another man "Tom" that there is a distinction between those men; but if a great mass of men say that a man who is called colonel is called so because of his distinguished valor and his superior ability, I believe those men. That is what I said.

Mr. ALLEN. I will say to the Senator from Florida that a few years ago I took a trip down into the section of country where the Senator lives——

Mr. CALL. That has nothing to do with this matter.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; it has something to do with it.

While driving over the mountains, as I remember, of an adjoining State I would say to the driver: "Who lives over there in that nice mansion?" "Colonel Moore." "Who lives over here at that place?" "Colonel Smith." "Who lives over here at this other place?" "Colonel Jones." I said to him: "All these men must have been in the army during the war." "Oh, no," he replied, "not one of them; they inherit their titles down here as colonel." And, Mr. President, in two days' drive in a country that had been settled for over two hundred years I could not find a man below the rank of major. [Laughter.] All the private soldiers seemed to have mysteriously dropped through the earth or disappeared in some form.

Mr. CALL. It is no harm for a man to be called major or colonel if he has a right to the title.

Mr. ALLEN. I suppose it is a little sign of weakness, however, if he is not entitled to it, and sometimes it is a sign of weakness if he insists on it when he is entitled to it.

Now, the Senator wants to supplement this military aristocracy by a civil aristocracy——

Mr. CALL. Oh, no; I am opposed to any aristocracy, and have not said anything of the kind.

Mr. ALLEN. The first thing you know this country will be turned over to the keeping of a few men, and the great masses of our patriotic citizens will become agricultural serfs to the ruling power.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. CALL. I protest against the Senator turning around to me and accusing me of such conclusions and opinions, when the Senator is proposing that every man shall be so poor that none but plutocrats and rich men can hold public office. The Senator is the man who is advocating a plutocracy and not I.

Mr. ALLEN. No, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. ALLEN. In a moment I will yield to the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. You are very kind; thank you.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not want a plutocracy in this country. I should like to get the plutocracy out of the Senate; I should like to get it out of the House of Representatives; I should like to get it out of the White House; I should like to get it out of the Supreme Court; and I should like to get the people enthroned in this Government, in every branch of it.

Mr. CALL. By making them so poor that they can not afford it?

Mr. ALLEN. I want to tell the distinguished Senator from Florida that now that the Populists have succeeded in destroying the Democratic party——

Mr. HARRIS. Since when?

Mr. ALLEN. In this Chamber; like the locusts, we are migrating to the Republican party, and we propose to destroy them, too [laughter], and the result will be in 1900 that the people will come into the inheritance of their own.

Mr. CHANDLER. Why does the Senator put it off to 1900, let me ask?

Mr. ALLEN. I put it off to 1900 because the scalawags who have revolutionized this Government have fastened their fangs so deeply in every department for the last thirty years that it will take six or seven years to uproot them and throw them out, and I do not anticipate——

Mr. HARRIS. To what scalawags does the Senator refer?

Mr. ALLEN. There are some things in this life that are so sacred that they ought not to be told; and I decline to answer my distinguished friend from Tennessee. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRIS. I supposed you would. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN. Let me make one more remark regarding the argument of the Senator from Florida, and then I shall be done. The Senator seems to think because a few men get into public life—and a great many of the people think that they get here wrongfully—that, therefore, instantaneously there springs up something that is sacred about their persons and about the persons of their wives and children that does not apply to the persons of the wives and children of the common masses.

Mr. CALL. Oh, no. I neither said nor think anything of the kind.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator says we give our great ability to the public service.

Mr. CALL. No, I did not say that.

Mr. ALLEN. Therefore our wives and children should be rewarded.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator will not misrepresent me. I ask him if he thinks it is right to state that I said things which I did not say? I never said anything about any great ability. No such word and no such idea will be found in my observations. I said the people had sent us here, and we had accepted the position, to perform certain duties, certain labor, which we did perform, and that a reasonable compensation for a proper method of life, enough to enable a person to live in decent comfort, and not in hovels and in extreme poverty, was a reasonable consideration.

Mr. ALLEN. I have heard the Senator from Florida insinuate, if not assert, on more occasions than one, that it was somewhat questionable whether the people sent all these Senators here or not.

Mr. CALL. I did; but what has that to do with the argument?

Mr. ALLEN. I think I have heard him intimate that probably those powerful corporations had reached out their tentacles like a great octopus and occasionally put a man into the Senate.

Mr. CALL. No doubt about that.

Mr. ALLEN. No doubt about that. Then, that destroys the argument that the people sent us all here.

Mr. CALL. The people sent some of us. The Senator must confine himself to facts. Sometimes the people send Senators here, and I suppose they have sent about nine out of ten, if not all. I have said that corporations have too much influence in elections, and that they ought to be restrained. And I say so now, and shall so vote on all occasions.

Mr. ALLEN. I agree with you.

Mr. CALL. But I have not said that the Senate of the United States was constituted of men sent here by the corporations. What I said was that the influence of corporations was a public evil that needed legislation, and I say it again, to restrain it, and that the poor people of the country should have the right to come here and be represented, and when they come they, with their families, should not be placed in circumstances of extreme poverty as a penalty for their honorable ambition and their public service.

Mr. ALLEN. Why do not Senators and other high officials, if they are undergoing the stress of poverty, turn their attention to the fruitful fields of money making in commerce and the law?

Mr. CALL. They have a right to come here.

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly you have a right to come, but you have a right to take the consequences when you come. You can not separate the office and the consequences which flow to the individual or his family from its occupancy.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator if he thinks it proper to make extreme poverty and being discriminated against, as compared with the average of the people, the penalty and consequence of accepting public service? Does the Senator advocate that?

Is that the treatment he would give to the people who had selected one of themselves to perform public duties which required him to devote all his time to the people's service? Does he think that would encourage the poor man, the private soldier, to devote his time to the people's service to say to him, if you serve the public you must content yourself with poverty and discomfort to yourself and family? I am opposed to all pensions for Senators and their families and for all civil employees, but the question of a reasonable compensation for services is certainly different.

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, no, Mr. President. If I could not make enough money out of the salary of my position in the Senate to support my family I would go back to my profession, where I can double it. I can make money there.

Mr. CALL. The Senator can not get out of it in that way. He fixes the salary, and upon his principle he would make it but $1.50 a day.

Mr. ALLEN. No; I would not agree to that. I should want at least $2 a day. No, Mr. President, if the salary is not large enough for the Senator from Florida——

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Florida has said nothing about it; nothing about its being too small or too large.

Mr. ALLEN. Or any other Senator; and he thinks that this Government should pension his widow and his children when he is gone——

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Florida said nothing about that.

Mr. ALLEN. Let him shake the dust of the capital from his feet, and go back into the fruitful fields of Florida, and earn ten or fifteen thousand dollars a year practicing law.

Mr. CALL. Let me again interrupt the Senator from Nebraska. The Senator reiterates here that because I may be a poor man I have no right to be in the Senate. What sort of a proposition is that? I said before that according to his argument, although I do not believe the Senator really believes it, we would have a Government in which none but the wealthy, the rich people, would hold office.

The Senator talks to me as if I did not think the salary is sufficient. I have said nothing about whether it is sufficient or insufficient. He is the one who has spoken of that matter.

Mr. ALLEN. I have said nothing about the poverty of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CALL. Oh, yes; the Senator did. Not meaning me, but any poor man who might be a Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. I am infinitely poorer than the Senator from Florida. The Senator had the distinguished honor, I understand, to enjoy some of the emoluments of official position——

Mr. CALL. Very few.

Mr. ALLEN. Very few and very little. I have been a grounding from childhood up. I had nobody to help me; not even to learn the alphabet of my native language. I had no one to help me to rise. The only possessions I had were a disposition and good health; and I am willing to take my chances in this world with any man, I care not who he may be, and I do not want my wife and my children to be pensioned if I happen to fail.

Mr. CALL. I do not want my wife and children, or the Senator's, to be pensioned, but I want my wife and children, and his, to have the $5,000 that has been allowed Senators in case of death and insufficient means of living. I should be very sorry if they were left in poverty.

But the Senator from Nebraska is not different from the great majority of Senators in this Chamber. They were all poor. If they have anything they have made it. They grew up from the ground, as he did, as I did, and as all our people do. He can not claim any merit because of that fact over other Senators here. We were all privates, and have all been chosen by the people, and are content to be of the people and take our chances in life.

Mr. ALLEN. I think I am through with the Senator from Florida, and I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Nebraska will not get into any discussion with me to-day. The Senator and the Senate will bear me out that I have taken very little of the time of the Senate. I wish to have a vote on the pending bill, but before a vote is taken I desire simply to read two sentences from the petition of Mrs. Spencer in asking for a pension. She says:

I asked him—

That is, her husband—

why, like other men, he did not have a pension.

This man was pensionable. He might have drawn thousands of dollars if he had applied for a pension, as most other men did, but he did not do it.

He answered what he had done for his country had been done with all his heart, and he would do it over again and never ask for a money reward. He was cast in a heroic mold, and I felt the nobility of his thought too much to press the matter further. As he became more ill I changed my thought and said that for his child's sake he should apply for a pension, and he promised he would when he was better. But he died. His widow and his young son are left penniless, and the world is hard for a woman, and an ill woman, to make a way to support herself and educate her child.

It is in this position I come to you.

That is, to Congress.

I ask of the country for which my husband fought and suffered the pension of $75 a month. This much I ask, for with strict economy I can with it educate my son and support us both until I, in some measure, regain my strength. I would not have more, for nothing but poverty, absolute poverty, could make me a pensioner even of the Government. I do not ask less, for with less I do not believe my purpose could be accomplished.

On former occasions I have combated the position so ably sustained by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN]. I do not agree with him in any of his propositions, but I have no disposition to detain the Senate now, and I am sure that I shall not do so on the discussion of any pension bill during the present Congress. I trust that a vote may now be had on the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. GALLINGER. On that I ask for a division.

There were on a division—ayes 22, noes 7; no quorum voting.

Mr. PASCO. I suggest, as the vote has shown the absence of a quorum, that the rule requires a roll call.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen,	Gallinger,	McMillan,	Squire,
Allison,	Gear,	Mantle,	Teller,
Bacon,	George,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Tillman,
Bate,	Gorman,	Nelson,	Turpie,
Berry,	Gray,	Palmer,	Vest,
Blanchard,	Hansbrough,	Pasco,	Vilas,
Call,	Harris,	Peffer,	Walthall,

Dubois,	Kyle,	Sewell,
Frye,	Lindsay,	Shoup,

Mr. TURPIE. My colleague [Mr. VOORHEES] is detained at his room by indisposition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a single question. At what rate did the Committee on Pensions fix the pension in this case?

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill as introduced provided for a pension of $50, and the committee voted to grant her $50.

Mr. HARRIS. And the Senator from New Hampshire proposes to increase the pension to $75?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have moved to increase the amount to $75.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I wish to state that I have knowledge that the lady who would be the beneficiary of this bill is at present in absolute want, wholly dependent, and has not a thing in the world. I hope a pension of $75 will be granted to her.

Mr. PASCO. I suggest that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions, so that the additional facts which have been brought out in debate may be considered by it, and if the committee sees fit to report the bill at the increased amount, it can do so. I make that motion.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection to the bill being recommitted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRAY. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] if the pension cases have been disposed of?

Mr. GALLINGER. There are several other cases, but it will not take much time to finish them.

Mr. COCKRELL. There are three or four other cases. Let us finish them.

Mr. GRAY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. VILAS. Let us finish the execution of the order. I ask the Senator from Delaware to withdraw his motion.

Mr. GRAY. I will withdraw the motion. I understood the Senator from New Hampshire to say that there were no further cases.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I said there were a few more cases.

Mr. VILAS. There are a few more cases. Let us dispose of them.

Mr. GRAY. I withdraw the motion, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is withdrawn, and the next pension case on the Calendar will be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 19, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

JOHN S. EVANS.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1601) to amend the military record of John S. Evans.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the muster rolls of Company E, Twenty-seventh Ohio Volunteer Infantry, the name of John S. Evans, and to grant him an honorable discharge from the service: Provided, That the passage of this act shall not serve to entitle him to any pay, bounty, or allowances.

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope we shall have a brief explanation of the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. This man whose military record the bill proposes to correct was a good soldier. He was arrested in connection with a dance which the junior officers of the regiment gave. Col. Michael Churchill, of Jamesville, Ohio, has sent here a very strong letter in favor of granting the relief asked. It is found that this man was not immediately responsible in connection with the disturbance which occurred. The citizens of the town where he now lives have unanimously asked this relief in a long petition which has been sent here. The man's record as a citizen from the time he left the service up to the present time has been good. There is no reason why the disability which he incurred should not be removed.

Mr. DOCKERY. It is understood that this bill carries no pay.

Mr. PERKINS. No pay—nothing of the kind. The favorable report of the committee, submitted by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON], is unanimous.

Mr. MILES. Is this the bill which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] asked time yesterday to consider?

Mr. PERKINS. No, sir.

Mr. LOUD. What is the present status of this soldier? Is he a deserter?

Mr. PERKINS. Under the charge which was made against him he was court-martialed.

Mr. LOUD. He is not a deserter?

Mr. PERKINS. No.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PERKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SUITS TO VACATE PATENTS UPON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. LACEY. I call for the regular order.

The House, as the regular order, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5474) to provide the extension of time within which suits may be brought to vacate and annul patents upon public lands, and for other purposes.

Mr. LACEY. I ask my colleague [Mr. HEPBURN] to withdraw his amendment now pending until we can dispose of the amendments reported by the committee.

Mr. HEPBURN. For the purpose suggested, I withdraw my amendment for the present.

Mr. LACEY. Now I desire to call for a vote on the committee amendment to insert before the words "special grant" the words "railroad, Mexican, Spanish, or other." So far as I am concerned, I think this amendment ought to be voted down, though I do not feel at liberty to withdraw it. The amendments which other gentlemen desire to offer can come up later.

Mr. LOUD. I wish to submit as a substitute for the amendment of the committee an amendment which I think will cover the whole proposition.

Mr. LACEY. Let it be read.

Mr. LOUD. I will read it myself:

In line 5 strike out the words "special grant" and insert in lieu thereof "railroad or wagon-road grants."

Mr. LACEY. I am not at liberty to accept that on behalf of the committee, but I think it ought to pass; and I call for a vote.

The amendment of the committee and also the proposed substitute of Mr. LOUD were read.

Mr. DOLLIVER. We would like to have a statement of the effect of this amendment.

Mr. LACEY. The effect will be simply this: The language of the original bill is "special grant." The substitute of the gentleman from California proposes to strike out those words and to insert the words "railroad or wagon-road grant," covering the two classes of grants in the adjustment of which the Department is now engaged.

There is no question of adjustment as to the grants to individuals; but the amendment proposed by the committee is broad enough to open up the entire question as to Mexican grants, the Spanish grants, and other special land grants mentioned in the bill. Now, if the substitute of the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] shall be adopted, it would eliminate everything from the bill in relation to the Spanish, Mexican, and other special grants, and would leave them untouched, and confine the scope of the bill to the railroad and wagon-road grants.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I am very much surprised that the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, who reported this bill with the committee amendment as printed, now recommends its abandonment. With that amendment out and nothing substituted, there is nothing whatever in the bill that would be of much value to the Department or the settlers.

Mr. LACEY. I do not think my colleague heard the proposition correctly. Something is substituted for the amendment of the committee. But all the Spanish and Mexican grants are eliminated from the bill, and we insert in lieu thereof the railroad and wagon-road grants. So that the whole matter is substituted except as to the Spanish and Mexican grants, upon which, as the gentleman remembers, we were not fully agreed in committee, and yet it was a question, in view of the fact that there was no special opposition to it, that we did not care to call to the attention of the House excepting in the shape that has been presented in the bill.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, the hearings before the Committee on Public Lands showed that some of the most outrageous frauds that were alleged to have been perpetrated were in connection with these very grants to which the gentleman has referred. I have in mind a single Mexican grant made, if made at all, when the Mexican law did not permit the granting of more than 11 leagues of land to any one individual, and yet it has been so surveyed and manipulated by the officers of the Government that it now includes 14 leagues of land; and we are informed that there are people in that vicinity who desire to enter these public lands as homesteads and they want the Government to at least purge the grant of fraud. If the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] is adopted, then all patents and certifications are confirmed, and we will be deprived of all right to investigate as to the validity of the original grant, the survey of it, or any fraud or mistake connected with its confirmation. I think that all of these grants, railroad, wagon-road, Mexican, Spanish, and special, should be put upon an equal footing and adjusted upon the same basis. There should be no special exceptions in favor of any of them.

The gentleman who spoke on yesterday questioned some statements of mine which were made in the discussion of the bill on a previous occasion. The information I gave to the House was, in substance, such information as came to the committee in the hearings on the bill; information that came from the Department which is supposed to know something of the early practice in making lists for railroads; information which I believe to be true, notwithstanding the denial of the gentleman. But, Mr. Speaker, if I am in error in stating that many of these lists were made under the impression that they should not be treated as patents, and if the gentleman is correct in stating that they were always treated as patents, then all the certificates behind which the gentleman undertakes now to shelter the railroads are the more outrageous, because he admits that there are many mistakes. I made no charge of actual fraud against the Department. I prefer to believe and would exonerate, as far as possible, the gentleman who made up the list. I know that the Commissioner, whoever he was, could not personally examine the tract books to find mistakes, and that he signed the lists prepared for him. I adopted what appeared to me to be a reasonable excuse for these errors. Now, if that is not true and these men knew that these lists were to have the force of patents, then the thousands of errors which are in many cases admitted, and in all cases in favor of the grantees, drive us to the conclusion that they were procured by corrupt methods either on the part of the railroad companies or the Government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is a class of settlers, and they have been entirely overlooked in the consideration of this bill, that is, those who claim under the public-land laws, whose rights should be protected in some way. This bill does protect, and it seems that its main object and purpose is to protect, purchasers from railroad companies. But little has been said and nothing done for the settlers who claim under the public-land laws of the United States. The interests of these two classes of settlers often conflict. For instance, A buys from the railroad company, which has an erroneous certificate or patent, as the case may be; B applies to enter the land under the homestead law, and alleges that the land did not pass to the railroad company and is of right a part of the public domain.

Now, this bill will confirm the land to the purchaser from the company and defeat the settler who has undertaken to claim under the public-land laws. There are many such settlers, but they have few friends here. That is the class I wish to protect first of all. They have stood in the breach and contested every inch of ground with the corporations from the time the grants were made, and yet they are now to be denied the right to take the land because the road has sold it to some speculator. I deny that this is right or just to claimants under our public laws. The proposition would confirm and fully protect the railroads. But no effort has been made to aid or protect that class of homeless citizens whom it is our duty to protect, and who have spent their time and money to vindicate the law. I hope this bill will not pass until some provision is made to protect bona fide settlers as was done by the act of 1887, and when their rights conflict with the rights of purchasers from railroads to give to them a preference.

In your efforts to give quiet and repose to speculative purchasers do not destroy the legal and the equitable rights of those honest settlers who have been contesting and expecting to finally acquire homes on these lands.

Mr. Speaker, I have already said I do not believe there should be any statute of limitations against the Government which will prevent the unearthing and exposure of frauds. I am not afraid that the settlers of the country who have patents will be troubled by lawsuits. In the history of the Government, prior to 1891, I believe only 25 suits have been recommended by the Land Department against agricultural patents. There is no danger of any honest settlers being troubled with lawsuits on the part of the Government. What the Department wants, and what it ought to have, is the right to correct any errors in these lists if they contain mistakes and to purge them of all frauds; and let us not, because some of these lists were signed by that great and good man, Thomas A. Hendricks, say that we will not examine any of them. I was a little bit amused at my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] yesterday, when he talked so eloquently about the lamented Thomas A. Hendricks. During the lifetime of that illustrious man I do not suppose that my friend from Iowa was ever heard to say a kind word concerning him, but when he is dead, and the gentleman from Iowa is speaking for a class of persons who hold as purchasers under great railroad corporations, he would shelter them behind that grand and glorious name. I revere the memory of Hendricks. The first Presidential vote that I ever cast in my life was a ticket upon which his name appeared as a candidate for Vice-President of the United States. No purer and no better man ever lived within the borders of the United States. I wanted to see him President.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MCRAE. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. You seem to quarrel with me because I speak well of Mr. Hendricks after his death.

Mr. MCRAE. No; I do not quarrel with you for speaking well of him even now.

Mr. HEPBURN. It is the post-mortem virtues of Democracy that I usually applaud. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCRAE. It is the improper use that you make of his good name and the outrageous purposes for which you would use it—perhaps unintentionally—to which I object. I challenge your right to use the good name of Thomas A. Hendricks, because he was once Commissioner of the General Land Office, to cover the mistakes or the frauds or the misconstructions, if you please, of these railroad certifications by which corporations and syndicates have secured millions of acres of land that they are not entitled to.

I deny that the statute of limitations which was passed in 1891 has been of any benefit to anyone. It passed without consideration. No one, so far as the record shows, knew of any such purpose. It was put in by a conference committee, and nobody except the conferees had any idea that there was any such provision in the bill. It did not belong there, and I think we should lose no time in repealing it to enable the Department and the courts to purge these railroad grants of fraud. When the 3d of March comes, if Congress does not act by repealing the whole statute of limitations or extending the time, you will find all these errors and frauds confirmed, and it will be done in the name of settlers. For ten years, upon this floor, I have tried in my humble way to reclaim some of the lands granted to railroad companies, and every time we have made an effort we have been met by just such eloquent vehemence as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] can furnish, insisting that it will disturb the titles of some innocent purchasers. In every step that has been taken we have tried to protect purchasers and settlers, and yet with every step the railroads, in the name of their purchasers, have grown bolder and more determined until finally they procured a statute of limitations, and with only one-fourth of the grants examined a proposition is made to stop the investigations, and the cry comes for repose to them and their purchasers.

Mr. LACEY was recognized, and yielded five minutes to Mr. LOUD.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] has expended a great deal of force, aimed presumably at Spanish and Mexican grants, but still his shaft has ultimately landed in the railroad camp. His remarks were directed presumably at the substitute amendment offered by myself, which simply eliminates from this bill the Spanish and Mexican grants and leaves intact the railroad and wagon grants. Now, let me say to the gentleman and to this House that there is not a Spanish or Mexican grant in this country which is not musty with the age of more than fifty years. There are no claims for Government lands pending upon any of these Spanish grants. We have been troubled in my State for a great many years, and we think the time has arrived, after more than half a century, when the bona fide settlers who have settled upon or who have purchased from these men who received Mexican grants should be protected in the title which they to-day have. For argument's sake I would admit that every acre of the Mexican grants was stolen, but they have been recognized for fifty years, and I hope the good sense of this House will now confirm the titles in these lands.

Mr. LACEY. I yield five minutes to my colleague [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, two days ago the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] made a statement to the House that the certifications under which these lands were held were in the early days not regarded by the authorities as anything more than mere notice to the world that the railway companies claimed these lands. The gentleman made that statement in face of the fact that before the first one now in controversy was issued that a statute of the United States required the officers of the Government to issue these certificates and the law gave to them all of the effects of patents. They are patents; and the gentleman ought to know it. For years he was chairman of the Committee on Public Lands and he must be familiar with the land system and the legislation; yet he made that statement here in the presence of this House.

I say that these lands are held under muniments of title as solemn as any that can be given by the Government of the United States, and the statement of the gentleman, lacking every feature of verity, was possibly made for the purpose of throwing some cloud or slur upon this class of cases. The gentleman says that he wants to unearth fraud. No man is proposing to throw a barrier in the way of such an inquiry. If he had read the amendment against which he declaims he would have seen that in that there was a provision whereby the Government can inquire into every case where a title had been secured through fraud or mistake. No one wants to throw an impediment in the way of such an inquiry. The gentleman was misleading when he said that the purpose of this bill was to secure inquiry in such matters. I make the statement to him now, and I challenge him to contradict it, that in all the investigations that have been made that have resulted in demands for reconveyance under the act of 1887 not one single instance can he find where fraud is alleged. In every instance the Department has simply urged that there was at a time an improper construction given to the statutes; that they now give another construction; and they want these suits to be brought to enforce a new construction that they now, after more than twenty years, give to the statute.

Wherever there has been a demand for reconveyance that demand is for the reconveyance of lands that were patented under the rulings of the Department as they then existed and as they were continued, not alone under the administration of Mr. Hendricks, but under the administration of gentlemen who have for many years, more than twenty years, administered the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office and of the Interior Department. There was no variation in them for more than twenty years, and I want to state again to the House that the controversies are not with reference to fraud, that the controversies are not with reference to mistakes, but they are controversies growing out of changed rulings and new constructions that have been given by the Department in cases of this kind. That is the only subject of inquiry that the Department proposes to make, and they have not yet brought a suit or attempted to bring a suit which made claim for reconveyance except in cases where this was the only difficulty. Now, lately they have changed this ruling and changed their construction, and they want to bring suit because of new light that they claim to have had, and thus cloud and disturb titles held by settlers for almost a generation.

Mr. LACEY. I now yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee [Mr. BOWERS].

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Speaker, this bill was under consideration by the Committee on Public Lands for over three weeks, occupying the time of every meeting of that committee. It came in there through a message of the President of the United States calling attention of Congress to the fact that the time would expire on the 3d of March when the United States, by its own action, was debarred from commencing action against patentees where patents had been obtained through mistake, error, or through fraud. During the whole of that time the members of the committee were occupied in satisfying themselves that the title of every bona fide purchaser should be protected. There are three sections in the bill, and in each section that is provided for. Before the committee appeared the law officer of the Department, Mr. Hall, and his proposition was simply that the time be extended to commence suits against railroad patents. That is all. At the last meeting, when this bill was reported, the words "to include Spanish and Mexican grants of lands," at the last moment, was included. I will come to that in a minute. I want to say to the members of the House, if they will give me their attention a moment, that if they will look at the bill they will find that the bona fide purchaser, whoever he may be, is protected, no matter if the railroad grant was made in error, or if it was made under fraud, still the bona fide purchaser under that notice is protected; and the bill provides always that the recourse of the United States shall be against the patentee and not the purchaser.

Section 1 provides that—

No patent to any lands held by a bona fide purchaser shall be vacated or annulled, but the right and title in such purchaser is hereby confirmed.

In section 3 it is provided that—

No suit or action shall be brought to cancel or annul any patent or certification for said lands until such claim is investigated by the Department.

We have provided all through the bill for protecting the rights of bona fide purchasers. Now, a word as to this amendment. As has been truly said, most of these Spanish grants are from forty to fifty years old, and there has been fraud in the granting of some of those patents; there is no question about that. But in the course of thirty, forty, or fifty years those lands have been settled, and whether the grants were fraudulent or not, this bill provides that every bona fide purchaser of those lands shall be confirmed in his possessions, and it is a very grave question, Mr. Speaker, whether we should reopen those cases. The Department has manifested no disposition to open up that field of inquiry. In fact, I may say that the representatives of the Interior Department have stated that in their opinion this bill protects every bona fide purchaser, and that the Department has no disposition to open up these cases except to investigate the various land grants made to railroads and wagon roads.

The reason they ask for this extension is that the amount of money they have had for making surveys and determining these matters has been insufficient, while the general business of the Department has not afforded them time to investigate these cases. For that reason they want a little more time to make the proper surveys and to prepare themselves fully in regard to these railroad and wagon-road grants. I can assure every member of the House that every lawyer on the committee (and I believe they are all lawyers but myself), together with the lawyers of the Interior Department, have agreed that this bill does provide for protecting every bona fide purchaser of lands, whether the original patent was issued in fraud or error or not.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the committee amendment and the substitute offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD].

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have the amendment reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment and also the substitute proposed by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read first the committee amendment, as follows:

Page 1, lines 4 and 5, after the word "a," insert "railroad, Mexican, Spanish, or other."

The proposed substitute was then read, as follows:

Strike out in line 5, page 1, the words "special grant" and insert in lieu thereof the words "railroad or wagon-road grant."

The question being taken, the substitute was agreed to by a vote of—ayes 73, noes 36.

The amendment as amended was then agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the second amendment of the committee.

The amendment was adopted.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, there are some other amendments that members desire to offer to the bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add to the first section the following language:

"Provided, That all lands patented or certified to any State, corporation, or individual, under the rulings or constructions of law of the Commissioner of the General Land Office or the Secretary of the Interior, at the time of the issuance of said patents or certificates, and when no fraud has been committed by the agent of the State or corporation or by the individual, shall be excepted from the operation of the provisions of this act as to extension of time and bringing of suits, and of the act approved March 3, 1887, entitled 'An act to provide for the adjustment of land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads, and for the forfeiture of unearned lands, and for other purposes.'"

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I move as a substitute for that proposed amendment the amendment which was read in my time yesterday.

The amendment of Mr. LACEY was read, as follows:

Add at the end of section 1: "Provided, That no suit shall be brought or maintained, nor shall recovery be had, for lands or the value thereof that were certified or patented in lieu of other lands covered by a grant which were lost or relinquished by the grantee in consequence of the failure of the Government or its officers to withdraw the same from sale or entry."

Mr. LACEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, a word of explanation. My colleague [Mr. HEPBURN] on yesterday explained that in Nebraska and in some other localities "lieu lands" had been patented in place of lands that the railroad companies had lost by reason of mistake in the Department in allowing settlement upon those lands. The amendment that I offer confirms the title to those lands that have been thus patented to railroad companies where they have lost other lands by reason of mistake committed in the Department. That will cover the point upon which my colleague based his argument yesterday.

Mr. TAWNEY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LACEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAWNEY. Your proposed substitute and the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] relate solely to "lieu lands."

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, the act of 1887 applies to lands that are known as "in place" lands as well as to "lieu lands."

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then why should we except lieu lands and still let the "place" and "indemnity" lands sold to bona fide purchasers remain under the provisions of the act of 1887?

Mr. LACEY. We do nothing of the kind. The bill in express terms already protects the bona fide purchasers of all kinds of lands, "lieu lands," "place lands," or any other kind of lands.

Mr. TAWNEY. It protects them at the end of a lawsuit.

Mr. LACEY. Not at all.

Mr. TAWNEY. It does not protect the bona fide purchaser so as to prevent a suit being brought by the Government against him and thus disturbing his title and the title to a great deal of land in the States where these suits are brought.

Mr. LACEY. That may be. But so it is always with any person. A suit may be brought to attack the title of anybody. But when we frame a bill which perfects the title of these men, which says their title shall be confirmed, and is confirmed, and that if suit be brought it shall be the duty of the court to at once confirm the title, nothing more, certainly, can be done.

But let me call the attention of the House and of my friend who wants light on this subject to the proposed amendment of my colleague, providing that when a patent has been issued, unless it has been issued by reason of fraud, that the title never can be assailed, although the railway company still remains in possession. It is true that by reason of some mistake tracts of land here and there have been certified or patented to railway companies that ought never to have received them, and the bill as we have prepared it will enable the Government to reclaim or recover those lands within the next five years. But if the amendment proposed by my colleague [Mr. HEPBURN] be adopted, that is the end of it. Unless you can show that the railway company was guilty of actual fraud, then, although the company may hold hundreds of thousands of acres that ought never to have been patented to it—lands which were patented to it by mistake—those lands can never be recovered. There is no reason why the railway companies should be thus protected and permitted to hold lands which do not properly belongs to them. There is reason why the settler should be protected. Whether the land which he purchased from the railroad company actually belonged to it or not, the company had the muniments of title, it had the patent, was clothed with apparent authority to make the conveyance, and the settler has purchased the land, entered upon it, taken possession of it, and improved it. In such cases, no matter how defective the railroad company's title may have been, the settler should be protected.

But while the lands are still in the hands of the company I see no reason why we should be careful to protect their title, if the land was conveyed to them by mistake.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman will concede, will he not, that when a railroad company has sold to bona fide purchasers, those purchasers ought to be protected by the Government?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly. Not only do I concede that, but we have expressly provided in the bill that they shall be protected.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, when we know, as we do, that the greater part of the lands granted to the railroad companies have passed into the possession of bona fide purchasers, ought we not to take notice of that fact and protect them?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. But ought we not to protect them against suits being brought by the Government to disturb their title?

Mr. LACEY. I advise my friend to read the bill; he will find that such purchasers are protected by it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Not against suits.

Mr. LACEY. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Why should we give protection against suits and confirm the title in the remainder of the lands which the railroad company has not conveyed and which ought never to have been patented to it?

Mr. TAWNEY. I am not in favor of that proposition. I have here a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman's colleague, and in my amendment it is provided expressly that the provisions of this act shall not apply to lands that are sold by a railroad company in good faith. This would leave the act applicable to all lands that are still held by the railroad company and which were granted by the General Government to the State for the benefit of the railroad company.

Mr. LACEY. The last part of section 1 provides expressly that—

No patent to any lands held by a bona fide purchaser shall be vacated or annulled, but the right and title of such purchaser is hereby confirmed.

Now, in order to protect settlers still further, so that they might not even be required to go into court and make defense, the option has been given to them under sections 2 and 3 to simply file their statement with the Secretary of the Interior (if they want to avoid litigation), setting forth the fact that they are bona fide settlers; and then it is provided in express terms that no suit shall be brought in relation to those lands until the matter is first investigated in the Department; and if, after adjudication there, it is held that they are not bona fide settlers, that adjudication is not conclusive against them, but they can still make their further defense in the courts.

The committee has been very tender in behalf of these bona fide settlers and has endeavored to protect them, not only in the courts but out of the courts, and has provided means by which they may avoid going into the courts at all.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the amendment and the substitute.

Mr. HEPBURN. I hope my colleague will not do that. I want to correct a misstatement which he has fallen into.

Mr. LACEY. How much time does my colleague want?

Mr. HEPBURN. Five minutes.

Mr. LACEY. Very well; I withdraw the demand for the previous question and yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman assures us that these suits will not be brought. Now, I know personally of an instance where, in the southern district of Iowa, the district attorney has been instructed to bring suit to recover some 25,000 acres of land. In order to bring any one of these suits, he says that it will be necessary for him to make parties to the suit all of the inhabitants of the town of Hastings, in Mill County, Iowa. There will be nearly 1,000 defendants in that suit alone. They can not recover without going through that process. It is true that no judgments will be rendered against any one of those persons by this fact, because they are bona fide holders; but they must appear in court and affirmatively show that fact. And my colleague ignores that condition of things entirely.

My colleague is in error again in another statement. The proposition I urged as an amendment to this bill does not do that which he says it will do. Whenever a mistake of fact has been made or a fraud perpetrated, actual or constructive, under my amendment suit may be brought. I only want to protect the settlers where there has been nothing of this sort, neither a mistake of facts nor a fraud of any kind. If fraud be found to exist, suits will be brought notwithstanding the adoption of my amendment. No lands are covered in the operation of this statute except, as I have said before, those issued under the rulings or construction of the Department, which has been continued from 1849 up to about 1875, twenty-five years or more of a continuous, uniform construction, which they are now seeking to overturn by later regulations or rulings.

I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that this is fair, and I do not think it is just to the people. My friend from Iowa says that suits could not be brought in many cases. I assert that every man living in the Eighth Congressional district of Iowa who owns lands that were conveyed under any one of these grants will have reason to fear a suit if this bill becomes a law. He can not know what particular land the Secretary will select for the purpose of suits. Everyone will fear, and he will feel it incumbent on him to affirmatively show to the Secretary, in order to prevent action, that he is a bona fide holder. He will be put to that expense, and it will cost the people of my district tens of thousands of dollars to make this showing, and what I say of that district may be truthfully said of every district in the State of Iowa, in Nebraska, Missouri, Kansas, and in many parts of the State of Illinois.

Every Representative, Mr. Speaker, is interested, it seems to me, in behalf of his people in preventing this kind of litigation. If we adopt my amendment there will be no danger of that, and all the purposes the bill seeks to accomplish will still remain unimpaired.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman in charge of this bill yield for a question?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman from Iowa state in a word what objection there is to the adoption of the substitute offered by his colleague from Iowa?

Mr. LACEY. It is very simple and only this: If the amendment be adopted we may as well kill the bill. There would not be enough left to swear by, although there might be enough to swear at. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Will not every case of fraud be still open to investigation under the bill?

Mr. LACEY. I was trying to answer my friend from Illinois. The amendment amounts to this: That no patent shall be hereafter canceled or annulled in behalf of the United States by suit except in cases where actual fraud is shown.

Now, hundreds of thousands of acres of these lands, by reason of departmental mistakes in construction of the law, have been patented to the railroad and wagon companies that never should have been patented to them. If the land has been sold we confirm the title of the purchasers from the companies. But if it has not been sold there is no reason why the company should retain it. That is the only difference between my colleague and myself. His proposition that we shall only go behind the patents in case of actual fraud would nullify this bill and also the act of 1887, which requires that all these railroad grants should be reexamined and readjusted in the light of the decisions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. HOPKINS. Now, just a further question. If I understand you correctly, if the amendment of your colleague is adopted it will confirm in the railroad and wagon-road companies all lands that they hold patents to that have been issued by mistakes in the Department?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly; every acre of them. Now, that ought not to be done, either.

Mr. HOPKINS. And that will take away all chance of upsetting these titles or again acquiring title to that property.

Mr. LACEY. We should not pass this bill after putting that sort of an amendment in it which will confirm all these mistakes, because the number of fraudulent patents is not very great. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS].

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, the pending amendment affects the title to about 201,000 acres of lieu lands in the State of Nebraska. If there should be any disturbance of the titles held upon those lands the whole matter could be carried back to affect injuriously an equal amount of land in another portion of the State, and thus involve the interests of settlers on over 400,000 acres of land in the State of Nebraska. About 201,000 acres of land were accepted by a certain grantee, in lieu of other lands to which that grantee was entitled in the South Platte country. The lands accepted in the North Platte country, in the State of Nebraska, were, in some instances, less valuable than those in the South Platte country. Nevertheless, the grantee accepted these lieu lands rather than disturb the settlers who had filed homestead and other entries upon South Platte lands properly included in the grant to which I have referred.

Mr. LACEY. May I ask the gentleman a question right there?

Mr. ANDREWS. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. I should like to ask him whether he deems it important for the interests of this large number of settlers in the great tract of public lands in his district that this bill should go through, confirming these titles so as to protect them?

Mr. ANDREWS. I do, Mr. Speaker, and I earnestly hope that the amendment proposed by the chairman of the committee will prevail. We have had an experience in Nebraska on a question like this, and I urge that no mistake be made in protecting our people from another experience so unsatisfactory to the settlers in the State of Nebraska. With this amendment, and another slight amendment that may be proposed later on, I earnestly hope that the bill may become a law. But, with the permission of the House, I desire to call attention to another important fact bearing upon this question.

The grant under consideration covers a period of about twenty-five years. Farmers have purchased lands under it and have invested the labor of almost a quarter of a century in the building of their homes.

If a period of ten years is sufficient to acquire title in other cases, why should not fifteen, twenty, or twenty-five years be sufficient for these pioneer farmers to secure absolute titles to their lands? Why should they be held in continued dread that they may be called into court to defend their titles?

They have earned their homes by the patient toil and struggles of years and should be given the absolute assurance that their titles will be confirmed without further delay.

Mr. TAWNEY. I should like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if he has any objection to incorporating in this bill a provision that will throw upon the Government the burden of proving in the first instance whether or not the sale from the railroad company to the purchaser was made in good faith, instead of putting the burden of proof of that fact, as the law of 1887 does, upon the purchaser in the first instance? The Government now proceeds upon the assumption that he is not a purchaser in good faith, and throws the burden of proof of ascertaining that fact upon the purchaser. I will ask the gentleman if he has any objection to a provision imposing upon the Government the burden of ascertaining as a condition precedent to its right to bring suit whether or not the settler is a bona fide purchaser? That will be a substantial protection to the actual, bona fide purchaser.

Mr. LACEY. Why, certainly I have an objection to that. The law is very simple now, and if a bona fide purchaser is brought into court, he, above all persons in the world, knows his own innocence, and if he can not prove it—if he is afraid to go into court and prove it—it certainly is of a very doubtful character. Now, to have the presumption of innocence apply to all these cases would practically handicap the Government to the extent that it could never rectify any of these errors in patents.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman did not understand my question.

Mr. LACEY. I understand it fully. You want to shift the burden of proof.

Mr. TAWNEY. Only in cases where the land is certified erroneously; not where it is certified through fraud or misrepresentation. Only where the error has been committed by the officers of the Government, and because of that error the land has passed into the possession of an actual, bona fide purchaser.

Mr. LACEY. This bill absolutely confirms the title to all that kind of land, and the assumption that the Government will bring suits where it knows it will fail, where the officers of the Government know the act of Congress has confirmed the title, is an assumption of something that I do not think we shall ever be faced with in the future. I do not think the suggestion ought to be put into this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question upon the amendment and the substitute.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman move the previous question upon the bill?

Mr. LACEY. There will be perhaps one other item of the bill to consider before the previous question is moved upon the bill. I move it upon the amendment and the substitute.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the previous question is ordered upon the amendment and the substitute, and if the substitute offered by the gentleman is voted down, will it be in order then to offer another substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa?

The SPEAKER. It will.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is ordered upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] and the amendment offered by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is the substitute.

The SPEAKER. It is an amendment to the amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment offered by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is there any other amendment?

Mr. ANDREWS. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. LACEY. Has the amendment been agreed to?

The SPEAKER. The amendment has been adopted as amended. The effect of it is the adoption of the amendment of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands. The question now is on the amendment to the original proposition offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, this pertains to section 2. I misunderstood the section. I am not offering an amendment to section 1. My amendment relates to section 2.

The SPEAKER. Is the proposition of the gentleman from Arkansas a substitute for the first section?

Mr. LACEY. No, sir; it is a substitute for the entire bill, so that it will come up later on.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all between the word "be," in line 9, and the word "and," in line 12 of section 2, and insert in lieu thereof "more than the minimum Government price thereof."

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, a moment's reflection will show that the terms of the bill would involve an inconsistency in some cases. For instance, $1.25 was the minimum Government price for certain lands which have been sold for less than that amount per acre. If the terms of the bill should go into effect, the maximum price in such cases would be 25 cents or 50 cents, while the minimum price would be $1.25. It would be very difficult to harmonize the provisions of the bill in practice if the wording should remain as it now stands. The amendment I have offered would, as a rule, require the grantee to pay to the Government the price at which he could have purchased the land from the Government in the open market.

Some of it may have been sold for more than the Government price, some of it for less. This amendment would leave the amount below the Government price, to be determined and adjudicated by the court. In my judgment, this plan would be far more reasonable than the one proposed by the terms of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE). The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LACEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question upon the bill and the substitute offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. McRAE. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 63.

Mr. McRAE. The yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 72, nays 151, not voting 132; as follows:

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the extension of the time within which suits may be brought to vacate or annul land patents, and for other purposes."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, before that motion is put, I desire to present a report from the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. HULL. I do, if it is merely a report to be printed.

SALE OF INTOXICANTS.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to submit a report in writing on House bill No. 2764 regulating the issuance of license for the sale of intoxicants. The committee are unanimous in the opinion that the bill ought not to pass, but in view of the importance of the question they have instructed me to ask the consent of the House that 500 copies of the report be printed for the use of members, and I now make that request.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The report was referred to the Union Calendar and ordered to be printed.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the Army appropriation bill; and pending that, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be closed in thirty minutes.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, for the present I think we had better go into Committee of the Whole and see what the bill contains. Have points of order been reserved on the bill?

Mr. HULL. All points of order are reserved.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I suppose there will be no difficulty in coming to an early agreement even in committee as to the length of the debate, but I do not think we ought to undertake to limit it at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

The motion of Mr. HULL, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will appoint the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. DOLLIVER, to act as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, and, in his temporary absence, will ask the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. HOPKINS, to take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HOPKINS). The House is in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, if members will take the bill (which is House bill 5359) with the report, I think I can explain it so that it will not be necessary to take up much time in general debate, the understanding, of course, being that under the five-minute rule there will be no attempt made to cut off a full expression of opinion when any particular item is under consideration. This bill carries $23,271,902, being a reduction from the estimates of over $817,000. It carries $23,000 more than the bill for the present fiscal year.

The committee have increased the appropriation for the Army proper—the pay of the officers and men of the Regular Army—over the bill of the present fiscal year, because the evidence submitted by the War Department was that under the appropriations made at the last session of the Fifty-third Congress large deficiencies in the pay of the Army have resulted.

We have made a reduction in the amounts appropriated for supplies for the Army, and this reduction was made after taking the testimony of the officers in charge of the different bureaus and departments showing they could stand the amount of reduction which the committee has made from the estimates without injury to the material interests of the Army.

I suppose the main matters of interest to the members of the committee and of the House will be those parts of the bill embracing new legislation. We have incorporated in the bill several provisions of new legislation, and can only appeal to members to permit them to be enacted into law by showing that they are calculated to be of great benefit to the different branches of the Army or that they put into better shape the different items to which they apply. They are largely administrative, and in no case a change in law not easily understood. I want to call attention now to these matters of new legislation.

On page 2, line 4, the committee has inserted a provision that hereafter no pay shall be retained from the enlisted men. Heretofore men have enlisted for a period of five years; and the amount of $12 was retained from their pay during the first three years of their enlistment. Now the enlistments are for a period of only three years; and the continuance of this practice is simply an annoyance to the men and an additional item of bookkeeping to the Paymaster's Department. The provision in the bill on this subject was inserted at the request of the Paymaster-General of the Army, who said that it could not possibly result in any harm to the Government, and would not affect the men except so far as to give them their pay in full from month to month, while saving the department much trouble in the item of bookkeeping.

On page 2, in lines 6 to 10, inclusive, will be found a provision that—

There shall be no appointments of hospital stewards until the number of hospital stewards shall be reduced below 100, and thereafter the number of such officers shall be fixed at 100.

This is new legislation. The statement of the Surgeon-General before the committee showed that on account of the reduction of posts no new appointments of hospital stewards are now being made, and that there would not be needed more than 100 hereafter. It was also stated by the Surgeon-General that if a further consolidation of the posts should go on in the future the number could ultimately be reduced below 100. This provision has been inserted upon the suggestion of the Surgeon-General of the Army, upon whose information the committee were bound to believe that they were in the line of proper legislation.

On page 3, lines 4 and 5, we propose to insert the words "inspection districts." This has been done at the request of the Inspector-General. At this time messengers serve at army headquarters districts or stations. There are one or two headquarters districts that are separated from inspection districts. This is notably the case in New York, where the headquarters of the army is at Governors Island, while the inspection district for the same division of the army is in the city of New York. While it is true that under the law as it now stands these messengers have served both at the inspection stations and the headquarters of the district, yet the provision to which I refer has been inserted to make it clear that the inspection districts have a right to their services. The provision involves no increase of expenditure; it adds nothing to the number of messengers employed in the Army; it simply makes clear as a matter of law what is now the practice.

On page 7, in lines 12 to 14, inclusive, will be found a provision that—

Hereafter a monthly allowance of $9.50 be allowed in lieu of the allowance for subsistence and clothing.

This matter, in which we have simply followed the recommendation of the Paymaster-General, is a mere simplification of bookkeeping. I call attention to the statement of the Paymaster-General on page 3 of the report:

General STANTON. I want to submit to the committee a matter of the estimated amount. I have made a memorandum I would like to explain. Now, when you come to make up these amounts for salary they are entitled to an allowance for rations of 20 cents a day, a clothing allowance provided by law. They are entitled to two-thirds of each of these allowances. The clothing allowance is constantly increasing or changing, and it is a great deal of bother to pay this account. It requires a great deal of minute detail, and it would be much simpler to give them a fixed sum. These men do not draw any clothing from the Government. The Government pays their allowance for clothing and rations in money. If a fixed sum be given it would be better than to have it constantly changing.

The CHAIRMAN. What would be the amount necessary?

General STANTON. Nine dollars and fifty cents would be about the sum in round figures. After careful figuring I think that would cover it and not increase the appropriation.

I then asked him whether $9 would not be sufficient, and he replied:

In answer to your question if striking out the 50 cents and making it $9 would be sufficient, I would say that it would not cover it. The $9.50 is simply a matter of simplification. There are a thousand on the retired list now; increasing all the time.

So that, according to the evidence of General Stanton, this is simply a question of bookkeeping.

On page 5, beginning at line 25, and including lines 1 and 2 on page 6, it is provided—

That hereafter all appointments made in the Pay Department of the Army shall be made by selection from the line of the Army.

Mr. Chairman, this provision was not inserted at the request of any officer of the Government. It simply reflects the opinion of the committee that these positions of high rank should be kept for men who devote their lives to the service of their country. Heretofore these positions in the Pay Department have been open to civilians, so that captains in the Army who have served twenty years—educated gentlemen without prospects of any promotion outside of the Army—have been deprived of these positions (which have the rank of major), while the places have been given to men who have never served in the Army, who have probably never been in any business for their country, and who, in many cases, are absolutely without any business experience—young men who have had influence enough to go to the President and secure appointments over the men who have been educated at the expense of the Government and who have served in the Army all their lives.

This, besides being a matter of justice, is also a matter of retrenchment. If you take for one of these positions an officer from the line of the Army you simply entail the increased expense of the difference between the pay of captain and that of major, while if you take a man from civil life you increase the charge on the Government by paying a new officer. That was one reason why we inserted this provision.

Mr. STEELE. I think the gentleman from Iowa is in error in his statement. If a captain of the line is appointed a major in the Paymaster's Department at the same time the vacancy is immediately filled by the first lieutenant——

Mr. HULL. Who is already in the Army.

Mr. STEELE. And the promotion of the first lieutenant is followed by the appointment of a second lieutenant to be first lieutenant——

Mr. HULL. The second lieutenant being also in the Army.

Mr. STEELE. And there is a vacancy to be filled from West Point or from the line of the Army——

Mr. HULL. I beg pardon of my friend from Indiana. The West Point man is already provided for. At the time of his graduation he is given a commission as second lieutenant, and if he is not assigned to duty then he has his commission, although he may be on detached service.

Mr. STEELE. But the vacancy may be filled by the appointment from the Army, and not necessarily from West Point.

Mr. HULL. But every graduate of West Point is provided with a commission as second lieutenant.

Mr. STEELE. But the line of the Army is not decreased. What I mean is that the appointment of a paymaster from the line of the Army does not decrease the line.

Mr. HULL. I think the gentleman is in error, although I yield to his superior army experience and knowledge.

But if a man graduates at West Point he is given a commission as second lieutenant—and we have several of them on detached service—and this provision simply makes a place for one of these officers to go on duty, but does not in any sense of the word undertake to provide a new second lieutenant in place of one who is promoted.

Mr. STEELE. All that I am suggesting is that the line of the Army is not decreased.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to me for a question?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. PICKLER. Paymasters may now be appointed from civil life, I believe.

Mr. HULL. Yes, sir; under the present regulations there is no restriction upon the President. He can appoint as he pleases.

Mr. PICKLER. Either from the Army or from civil life?

Mr. HULL. Either from the Army or civil life.

Mr. PICKLER. What is the object in applying this provision to army officers?

Mr. HULL. Well, one great object is that the man in the Army who was educated at West Point at the expense of the Government has no other mode of promotion or advancement except in the line of his duty. He must look solely to that. The man in civil life, on the contrary, has the whole world, except the Army, open to him.

Now, in this period of profound peace, when we are not calling for the services of any of our civilians to defend the flag or the honor of the country, it seems to me that the men who, by their profession, are limited in opportunity for promotion or preferment should have at least their chosen profession reserved to them. That seems certainly to be reasonable and proper. And I call the attention of the gentleman, and the committee also, to the fact that while it is no reflection on the President, yet it is true that in repeated instances men have been appointed to army and navy paymasterships who have no claim upon the country except through friends who had a "pull" with the President. And that is not confined to either party.

Mr. PICKLER. Is it not true that the Army is continually encroaching on the civil employment?

Mr. HULL. No, sir; it is not by any means true. And further, the Military Committee of the House believes that in reserving the right to promote men from the ranks to be second lieutenants by competitive examination that it reserves all that we ought to reserve to any civilian in the Army. And for myself, I have opposed all increases in the cadets at West Point for the very reason that I wished to preserve to the boys who enlist from civil life, and those who study by the camp fires, and read and obtain information to enable them to stand the competitive examinations in the Army, the right to reach this position of lieutenant directly from the ranks. [Applause.] I say it should be preserved to them exclusively. If a boy has enlisted and served two years and studied day and night when off duty, and has shown himself possessed of the metal to make an officer, I want, when he has gone into that, to preserve to him all the possibilities that may come to him by successful competitive examination that can be afforded by the military service of the United States. [Applause.]

These civilian officers are not in touch with the men. They never come in contact with them. They step from civil life to a majority in the Army. To keep the Army in touch with civil life you should not commence at the top, but rather keep the close sympathy by letting the active, intelligent young fellows work out of the ranks into second lieutenants, and then stand on an equality with the West Point graduate.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the committee to a provision which is inserted in the bill on page 8, lines 7 to 14, inclusive, in the following words:

Provided, That hereafter, in case the public quarters at any station are so full as to prevent the assignment of quarters in kind to a commissioned officer there stationed on duty with troops, commutation of quarters at the usual rates shall be paid to him as is now authorized by law to officers on duty without troops; the question of inadequacy of quarters in each case to be determined by the Secretary of War.

Mr. McMILLIN. Before the gentleman enters upon the discussion of that branch I should like to call his attention to one fact, and I do so because I think he has probably unintentionally misled the House as to the effect of the amendment concerning the appointment of officers in the Pay Department. He says that it is an economy to have it in the way proposed in the bill, rather than according to the old law, because the officer appointed from the rank of captain would only receive the increase of pay between the rank of captain and that of paymaster, whereas, if appointed from civil life, there would be the additional expense of his entire salary. But does it not follow that when the captain is taken from the captain's rank and made a paymaster by operation of law all the grades under him move up and are promoted, so that the line is just as expensive as it was before?

Mr. HULL. I think not, and I think I can show my friend why it is not so. When you appoint a captain to be a major, you move a first lieutenant up to be a captain, and a second lieutenant to be first lieutenant, but you do not increase the number of men in the Army. Now, when you put in a paymaster from civil life you have a paymaster in addition to the other officers.

Mr. McMILLIN. But do not your inferior officers in each case come up a step and fill up the different ranks?

Mr. HULL. You do not increase the number of second lieutenants; you do not increase the number of men in the Army.

Mr. McMILLIN. You have still a captain drawing pay; you have still a first lieutenant drawing pay; you have a second lieutenant drawing pay, just as you had before. So I think the gentleman upon reflection will see that there is really no saving.

Mr. HULL. No; you decrease absolutely the number of second lieutenants, to put it at the very lowest point, because you have a second lieutenant, first lieutenant, and a captain already in the Army who are promoted one grade, and there is another second lieutenant not assigned to duty who is already in the pay of the Government, while in the other case you have your unassigned second lieutenant, your assigned second lieutenant, your first lieutenant, and captain, and a major who has not been an officer in the Army, in addition to the others who are already in the Army.

Mr. STEELE. That is, assuming that there are surplus second lieutenants who are eligible to assignment.

Mr. HULL. There always have been a certain number of unassigned second lieutenants.

Mr. McMILLIN. But when there is no surplus of second lieutenants, what I stated is true.

Mr. HULL. Then you would have the same number; but you take your men from the Army still, in order to fill the vacancy; but there are now and always have been unassigned second lieutenants, drawing pay from the Government.

Mr. RAY. As I understand you, then, this proposition of yours simply puts a lieutenant in active duty who has been drawing pay, and who was not before in active duty as a second lieutenant?

Mr. HULL. That is the effect of it. In the other case it takes a man from civil life and makes a major of him; that is, if you do not pass this provision; while if you do pass this provision, it makes a major out of a captain who has probably served twenty years under the Government.

Mr. STEELE. Then, according to the gentleman's argument, the main abuse comes on account of the appointing power not exercising his duty with discretion. He might appoint a volunteer officer of the late war, who has won glory on the field, and then you would not object to it?

Mr. HULL. I would not object to it; but I have not heard of any of those men being appointed within the last twenty years.

Mr. STEELE. I think there have been one or two.

Mr. HULL. There were some appointed soon after the close of the war, but none in recent years; and I think it safe to say none such will ever again be appointed.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman from Iowa allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will this section prevent the appointment of a paymaster's clerk.

Mr. HULL. It has nothing to do with the position of paymaster's clerk?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will it prevent the appointment of such a clerk to be paymaster?

Mr. HULL. Yes; it will prevent any civilian from being appointed paymaster.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Paymaster's clerks are not civilians.

Mr. HULL. Oh, yes; they are civilian employees.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. They are subject to martial law.

Mr. HULL. They are civilians. They are not in army life.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The duties of a paymaster are not military in their character at all. The very best paymaster would be a bank teller; and when you confine the appointment of paymasters to the Army to officers of the line, then you take those men away from their regular duty, the regular military service, for which the country has paid enormous sums to educate these men.

Mr. HULL. That simply comes back to a question of judgment.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I know of two or three cases of gentlemen who are now serving as paymasters' clerks, and who have served in that capacity for thirty years, some of them, waiting for the chance to be appointed paymasters of the Army. They have handled millions of dollars without bonds.

Mr. HULL. That question will come up in a few minutes, if I can have an opportunity to go forward. I was giving an explanation of the new legislation. There is no doubt about it being subject to a point of order, so that my friend from Missouri can kill it if he wants to. I want to call attention to the item giving commutation of quarters to officers on duty with troops. Under the present law if on duty without troops where there is no commutation of quarters, a captain gets three rooms at $12 a month each, a major gets four rooms at $12 a month each, and so on, according to rank. The law as it now stands provides that in case an officer is in active service with troops and quarters are found inadequate he can not have commutation of quarters.

The Secretary of War, through Major Davis, states that it would not probably amount to more than $500 a year if this provision should be adopted. But, Mr. Chairman, I want to be entirely frank with the committee and state that the general in charge of the department of the Government furnishing quarters has stated to me that if this new provision became law it would be open to great abuse and would probably cost the Government $20,000 a year, instead of $500. Now, the younger officers on duty with troops, being generally unmarried men, are consolidated together in what they call a bachelor's hall. They do not have the number of rooms that the law really gives them, if they are not on duty with troops. If the officers are dissatisfied with their quarters, under such a provision as proposed the officers could condemn a large number of the quarters in order that officers might get $12 a room per month, and they would go out and rent rooms, paying the rent from money received as commutation of quarters. I want to make this statement, because it came too late for me to put it in the report.

Mr. STEELE. You can knock it out on a point of order.

Mr. HULL. I understand. On page 10, line 24, and on page 11, lines 1 and 2, there is a provision:

For toilet articles, barbers', laundry, and tailors' material for use of general prisoners confined at military posts without pay or allowance.

That gives them the right to expend money for these items. Under the old law our prisoners were confined at the military prison at Fort Leavenworth. That was turned over to the Department of Justice, and these prisoners are now confined at posts. There is no law that authorizes them to have any toilet articles, any soap, or barber's supplies whatever. This is simply to meet the changed conditions since the military prison was turned over to the Department of Justice.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is there any new legislation on page 9? I see there are several "provided furthers."

Mr. HULL. Not at all. That is the old law.

On page 15, lines 7 to 9, there is a new provision:

For a donation of $5 to each dishonorably discharged prisoner upon his release from confinement, under court-martial sentence involving dishonorable discharge.

They are now turned out without any transportation whatever, and we have followed in this the recommendation of the War Department, and in addition to that, we have followed the humane law of all the States, I think, of this Union.

On page 20, lines 20 to 23 inclusive, we provide:

For a suit of citizen's outer clothing, to cost not exceeding $10, to be issued upon release from confinement of each prisoner who has been confined under a court-martial sentence involving dishonorable discharge.

As the law stands to-day every prisoner discharged from the service of the United States is turned out in prison clothes, without any allowance whatever, and we believe it is an inhumanity in the General Government to turn the prisoner out from his confinement dressed in prison garb; so we make this provision. I wish to say, in addition, this is made necessary for the same reason that they are confined in different posts on account of turning over the military prison to the Department of Justice, so that we have no national military prison now.

Mr. STEELE. As a matter of information, I want to inquire if prisoners in our army posts are dressed in striped clothes?

Mr. HULL. I do not know how they are dressed. But the information we have is that they are turned out in their prison garb.

Mr. STEELE. The inquiry I was making was for the purpose of knowing whether they were dressed in striped clothes.

Mr. HULL. I do not know what they are dressed in. The gentleman will probably know better than I.

Mr. STEELE. I think that the prison garb is the uniform of a soldier.

Mr. HULL. Just what they use I do not know. The Secretary of War recommends it.

Mr. STEELE. I am in favor of the proposition.

Mr. HULL. The Secretary informs us that these men are simply turned adrift, and have no other dress than the prison garb. What that is I do not know.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. It is the uniform of the service of a common soldier, worn very much.

Mr. HULL. I am simply submitting the language; and we think that the soldiers so discharged should be given a suit of civilian's clothes.

Mr. STEELE. I think so, too.

Mr. HULL. Now, to go back to page 9, after the word "fare," in line 11, the committee have stricken out the words "and transfers"; so that under this amendment, if adopted, the Government would pay the entire transportation of officers going from one part of the country to another on orders of the Department except parlor-car and sleeping-car fare. Those they have to pay themselves, but they claim that they are frequently subjected to annoyance in being compelled to pay 50 cents for a transfer. The estimate was that this item might perhaps amount to $100 a year, and the committee thought it desirable to insert it here, but of course it is new legislation.

Mr. RAY. Do I understand the gentleman to say that if an officer of the Army is ordered from Washington to San Francisco, traveling of course by rail, he must pay his own sleeping-car fare?

Mr. HULL. Yes; he pays his own sleeping-car fare and parlor-car fare, but he is allowed 4 cents a mile for it.

Mr. RAY. Then he would simply have 4 cents a mile allowed him on which to travel from here to San Francisco?

Mr. HULL. Oh, no. He would get his transportation from the Department, the actual railroad fare from here to San Francisco, and 4 cents a mile in addition.

Mr. KIEFER. The Government furnishes the transportation?

Mr. HULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. KIEFER. And the Government pays him 4 cents a mile in addition to that for other outlays?

Mr. HULL. The Government furnishes transportation by the officer paying for his ticket and charging it on his expense account.

Mr. DINGLEY. Four cents a mile on a long railroad journey would amount to $20 a day.

Mr. HULL. Yes; for a long distance it would be high, but for a short distance it would not amount to much.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is a pretty large allowance on a long journey.

Mr. STEELE. But not on a short one. If the officer traveled 40 miles the allowance would amount to $1.60, while he might have to pay a hotel bill of $6 a day.

Mr. HULL. That is so. The officers generally take their families with them on these journeys, and a man who does that is generally subjected to large expense.

Then, on pages 9 and 10, there is a proviso:

And provided further, That advance mileage may be paid for all distances over 2,000 miles, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may provide.

It was formerly the practice, under a ruling of the Treasury, to advance this money, and the Inspector-General tells us that never was a cent lost by that practice, but now if an officer is ordered from here to California he has to pay all of his expenses himself and then come back on the Government, and in many instances the officers are compelled to borrow money to do it.

Now, this provision simply authorizes the officer, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, to draw in advance money sufficient to meet the cost of making the journey. That is all there is in it, and every member of this Committee of the Whole is as competent to judge of its propriety as we are.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will that interfere with the system of adjudicating the accounts in the Treasury Department? All amounts must now be drawn from the Treasury under the law that was enacted by the last Congress, which provides special safeguards for the Treasury. Now, this varies that system of accounting, does it not?

Mr. HULL. I doubt, Mr. Chairman, that it would vary the system of accounting. The law fixes the amount that an officer is entitled to receive, and this is regarded as a desirable reform. General Breckinridge, in his statement to the committee, among other things, said:

General BRECKINRIDGE. There is another matter I wish to call your attention to. We travel a good deal in my department, and there is a matter there which I think can help us without increasing expense, and that is if you will authorize an advance of mileage. We had it for a long time and there has never been any loss. Mr. Kent will read the proposed amendment.

Mr. KENT. Insert, after the word "railroad" after the last "and," "Provided further, That advance mileage may be paid, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, for all distances exceeding 2,000 miles."

General BRECKINRIDGE. The officers have to borrow money and pay interest on it whenever they go out under orders of the Government. It does not affect me, because I have a bank account. It has never caused any loss, and I do not believe it will. The mere idea is to fix it so that the Government for carrying on its own business shall stand its own expense.

Mr. KENT. Under the old practice the Treasury advanced mileage, and permitted it to be paid for all distances exceeding 2,000 miles and in special cases distances exceeding 1,000 miles. That was the case until the Second Comptroller called a halt by referring to the statutes, which provide that no advance of public money shall be made on any account whatever. He construed that as cutting off the authority of the Secretary of War. When an officer gets orders to travel distances over 2,000 miles he must make the advance himself sufficient to cover the mileage.

It is simply an advance of the amount of money which the law provides that he shall have for that purpose.

Mr. CONNOLLY. No other officer of the Government is allowed to draw in advance in that way.

Mr. DINGLEY. I was about to say that this changes the whole system of adjudicating the accounts of the Government. Of course no vouchers accompany this proposed advance of money. Has the gentleman consulted the Treasury officials about this?

Mr. HULL. No. I have stated all the information we have about it. All that we have received comes from the War Department.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think the Treasury officers ought to be consulted as to how it would affect the settlement of the accounts.

Mr. STEELE. It will not make any change at all. An officer is ordered to-day from here to San Francisco. As a general rule officers live up to their pay. Now, instead of going to an individual and borrowing the money, often at a high rate, this permits the paymaster or the quartermaster, or whoever has charge of the funds, to advance the officer the necessary amount with which to make the journey. When he has completed the trip he is required to make up his vouchers, which show that the Government owed him this amount, but that it has been paid in advance. That is all there is in it.

Mr. KIEFER. It is simply an advance.

Mr. HULL. For many years this was the rule under the same law that now exists, but some Treasury official held that these advances could not be made under the law, and so, for nine or ten years past, they have not been made.

Mr. RAY. Perhaps the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs can give me a little information that I desire. As I understand it, the pay and allowances of an officer in the Army who is an unmarried man are precisely the same as the pay and allowances of a married man.

Mr. HULL. Exactly the same.

Mr. RAY. And when they travel from one point to another are officers who are married allowed anything for the transportation of their families?

Mr. HULL. They are not. The Government does not take into consideration the family of the officer at all. It is the officer only that the Government deals with.

Mr. RAY. So that the married officer is compelled to bear this expense out of his pay?

Mr. HULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAY. Then the law is rather a discouragement to officers of the Army to enter into matrimonial alliances.

Mr. DINGLEY. The case is not different with these officers from what it is with all other Government officers.

Mr. HULL. There are supposed to be compensating advantages to a man with a family which will induce officers to enter into the marriage relation.

Mr. STEELE. And they do have families.

Mr. HULL. Yes, and some of them quite large families.

On page 11, line 13, we have inserted another provision of new legislation.

Mr. DINGLEY. Has the gentleman stated all the new legislation on page 9?

Mr. HULL. There is one other matter; we have left out the words "and transfer."

As I was about so say, on page 11, in line 13, we provide for the publication of 3,000 cookbooks. Of this book the last Congress authorized the publication of 1,500 copies. The edition was at once exhausted by demands from the National Guards of the different States and from the Regular Army. There is a very large demand now for this publication from all parts of the country. In the language of General Morgan, this is something that is wanted North, South, East, and West. The only question in the mind of the committee was whether 3,000 copies would meet the demand from the National Guard, the military schools, and the Regular Army. Anything which will teach a better method of cooking in our Army is, it seems to me, a very good provision. But it is new legislation.

The provision on page 16, lines 5 to 9, inclusive, is not new legislation, but it appropriates $30,000 in excess of the estimates. If gentlemen will turn to page 5 of the committee report they will find the statement of General Batchelder, Quartermaster-General of the Army, showing that upon the appropriation of $80,000 for this item last year there has been a deficiency amounting to $49,900. The Secretary of War cut down the estimates from $130,000 to $100,000, but in conversation with me he stated (and he agreed to send a letter to that effect, which I have not yet received) that he believed the amount estimated by General Batchelder of $130,000 was the very least that ought to be appropriated by Congress. As there is a deficiency of $49,900 under the law of last year, it makes practically the $130,000 in this bill; so there is no increase in fact.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman again state the page of the bill to which he refers?

Mr. HULL. Page 16, lines 5 to 9. The provision to which I am now referring is not subject to any point of order. I simply want to call attention to the fact that it is an increase over the estimates.

On page 23, in lines 18 and 19, the committee have inserted new legislation providing ammunition for burials at the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers. To-day there is no authority of law for the issuance by the Government of a single grain of powder for the firing of a salute over the grave of an old volunteer when his remains are carried from the Soldiers' Home to their last resting place. The committee believe that as a simple mark of respect to these veterans the Government should make provision for this expense and not allow the surviving comrades of an old soldier to provide by subscription for furnishing this powder to fire a salute over his grave. The salute is now always fired, but it is done at the expense of the inmates of the Home. Of course this provision is subject to a point of order.

On page 24, in lines 8 to 13, we provide for firing a morning and evening gun at the National Homes for Disabled Soldiers. There is now no law for this. General Flagler in his statement before the committee said that on account of the cheaper methods of manufacturing the powder to fire these morning and evening guns no increase in the appropriation would be necessary. The best grade of powder is not used for these purposes.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to say further that in the formation of this bill the committee gave the highest amount asked for by the Ordnance Department of the Government. If we had not believed that the provision would be subject to a point of order, and if we had not been held back by the condition of the Treasury, the committee would have been in favor of a larger appropriation for the additional manufacture of small arms. This Government, with its million of men ready to enter the military service whenever the necessity may arise, is absolutely without the means of arming them for the defense of the Government. There is no other Government of the magnitude or power of ours that has not a reserve of arms that can be used in case of war.

We have increased the appropriation over last year for the manufacture of the smokeless powder, and, according to the evidence submitted before the committee by General Flagler, with this increase of $25,000 we shall not accumulate more than $15,000 worth of powder each year. We ought to accumulate a stock of powder that would give us an available supply in the event of hostilities. We have not now such supply. But the increased appropriation of $25,000 will gradually increase our reserve in this respect.

Some gentlemen may say we ought not to increase our stock of this powder because it will deteriorate. The evidence before the committee was that the powder will be as good fifty years from now as it is to-day.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe I have explained the bill in probably more minute detail than was necessary, and I yield the floor to anyone who desires it.

Mr. BARTHOLDT rose.

Mr. HULL. Does the gentleman wish to ask me a question?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HULL. Then I retain the floor in order to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I wish to ask the gentleman whether in his statement of new legislation embraced in this bill he has included the provision on page 5, in lines 24 and 25?

Mr. HULL. I have already stated that it was new legislation, and I called attention to the fact that it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. KIEFER. To what page do you now refer?

Mr. HULL. To page 5, as to the Pay Department—the proviso at the bottom of the page.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I desire to reserve the right to make the point of order upon that provision.

Mr. HULL. All points of order have been reserved.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, after the very full and satisfactory explanation of the gentleman from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, I do not deem it necessary to consume the time of the committee by adding anything. But on behalf of the minority of the committee I wish to say only this, that we indorse everything in the bill and every statement made by the chairman of the committee, and add that the bill is unanimously reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. It was ordered to be reported favorably by every member of the committee, and the report was voted for by all of the members, the majority and the minority alike.

Mr. HULL. Now, Mr. Chairman, if no other gentleman desires to occupy the floor, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be read by sections for debate and amendment under the five-minute rule; of course with the understanding that anyone can have his time extended who wishes to occupy the floor during the five-minute debate for a longer time on any provision.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to the fact that an unusual amount of general legislation is carried in this bill. It has been explained in a very careful and systematic way, each different item in detail, by the chairman of the committee.

I struggled, when we were debating the rules, to get the right for the appropriation committees to change the law so as to reduce expenditures on an appropriation bill. But it could not be done. There was no spirit, it seems, to have that rule in force which had worked so advantageously for so many years and under which the main economies that have been effected in this Government have been forced.

Now, I am not going to take up the time of the committee in anything like an extensive commentary on the provisions of the bill. I only wish to say——

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman pardon me for a suggestion?

Mr. McMILLIN. Certainly.

Mr. DINGLEY. Are there any amendments proposing new legislation on this bill that would come under that provision of the old rule? There is no provision to reduce expenditures which would have brought it under the old rule.

Mr. McMILLIN. No, sir; that is just the very point that I am complaining of. You can increase expenditures, it seems, on a general appropriation bill, but you have no right to diminish them.

Mr. DINGLEY. Oh, no; you can not increase expenditures by adding new legislation. The new legislation is subject to the point of order, of course, if it be new legislation.

Mr. McMILLIN. And while I have great confidence in my good friend from Iowa [Mr. HULL], who has spoken of the bill, and also my friend from New York [Mr. McCLELLAN], who has spoken in favor of it, I think it would be decidedly better if we were to pursue that old policy in reference to appropriation bills; or else, if we were to pursue the new policy, let us hew to the line and let legislation come on legislative bills and appropriations on the appropriation bills.

As I understand the gentleman from Iowa, he has indicated that the officers of the Army say that on this question, of the commutation of quarters, the expenditure will probably involve an increase of $20,000.

Mr. HULL. He did not say that it would be an increase, but that it might be liable to that.

Mr. McMILLIN. And the gentleman said further that the testimony of the General of the Army was that it would be subject to grave abuses.

Mr. HULL. No, I did not say that the General of the Army said that.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then I misunderstood the gentleman. May I ask what official made that statement?

Mr. HULL. I said the general in charge of the disbursements said it was liable to abuses. The General of the Army, I wish to say, has never made any statement at all upon the subject.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then I misunderstood what the gentleman said. But the officer having the matter in charge has indicated that it would involve an increase of expenditures of $20,000, as well as be liable to great abuses.

I wish only to call the attention of the committee to the fact and suggest how much better it would be if we could have our appropriation bills simply what their names indicate, and not legislative measures.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I hope my friend and colleague from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] will not frighten the House by any such declarations, of an immense amount of new legislation involved in the pending bill, as he seems to indicate. The subcommittee in charge of the bill, and, the whole committee, were exceedingly careful in framing the bill, and, as stated by the chairman of the committee, were unanimous in reporting the bill to the House.

I am not personally aware of any legislation vicious in its character in this bill that increases appropriations or that is legislation per se. If there had been any, I should certainly have opposed it in the committee. There were some little matters that the committee found, after careful and thorough investigation, should be changed from existing law, and those little changes are made in the bill. When they are reached in reading the bill by sections, if a point of order will lie against them, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] can have them stricken out, unless we can explain them satisfactorily to the House. I do not believe my friend, when he hears this bill read by sections and explained, will find any legislation in it that he will seriously object to.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, a single remark. I agree entirely with the gentleman from Tennessee that it is not wise as a rule to attempt legislation upon appropriation bills, no matter whether it is done under the guise of reducing appropriations or for any other purpose. We all know that the old rule that an amendment providing for legislation in an appropriation bill to reduce appropriations might be held to be in order was subject to great abuses under which very important changes of law were proposed, under the guise of reducing the appropriation. I think that it is appropriate that on appropriation bills we should not attempt to legislate unless there is incidentally some matter in which the whole House unanimously agrees there ought to be something done. Of course where the whole House agrees, in the matter of administration especially, that some particular item of legislation is desirable, then it will go in without objection and there can be no evils arise from that.

But it is true that ordinarily legislation attempted upon a general appropriation bill is hasty legislation, or, if not hasty legislation, is such legislation as would have been much better if considered by the appropriate committee and brought in in a separate bill. As to these incidental matters of legislation relating to administration, if any particular one seems to every member of the House to be desirable and wise, then no objection will be raised and it will go through, as a matter of course. If there are any which seem to individual members of the House to be unwise, then they will go out on a point of order, and must be brought into this House from the appropriate committee in a separate bill.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, the statements made by the gentleman from Tennessee for the benefit of the chairman of the committee are about such statements as are made on every appropriation bill that comes into this House, and notwithstanding such statements there has never been an appropriation bill brought into the House which has not had in it legislation of the character indicated in this bill, and I venture the assertion that there never has been an appropriation bill brought into the House in which the changes of existing law have been so minutely described by the chairman of the committee as they have been by the chairman of this committee, giving every gentleman in the House an opportunity of striking them out if desired. They meet the very point made by the gentleman from Maine, that if there is a single man who has an objection to any one of these items, it has been brought to his notice, so that he can strike it out if he desires to do so.

Mr. HULL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will ask that we proceed under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1897:

FOR PAY OF OFFICERS OF THE LINE.

For pay of officers of the line, $2,768,000.

Mr. PICKLER. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by adding after line 9, page 1, the following:

"Provided, That such officers shall not hereafter be detailed as Indian agents."

Mr. HULL. I raise the point of order on that amendment that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Dakota desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. PICKLER. It is very doubtful whether it is new legislation or not. Under the existing law the President may detail army officers.

Mr. STEELE. And this says he may not. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will sustain the point of order.

Mr. PICKLER. I should say that that provision is put in the appropriation bill from year to year. That is the reason why I say it is questionable whether it is existing law or not.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, if the law fails by not being put in the appropriation bill, the gentleman from South Dakota will have gained his point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PICKLER. I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding after line 9, page 1, the following:
"Provided, That such officers shall not hereafter be detailed as Indian agents unless nominated to such place by the President and confirmed by the Senate."

Mr. HULL. I reserve the point of order on that.

Mr. PICKLER. I hope the gentleman will accept that amendment.

Mr. HULL. Well, I shall not.

Mr. SAYERS. I want to suggest to the gentleman that if an officer of the Army should be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate to any other office he would not only lose his salary, but his place also.

Mr. PICKLER. That is something for the army officer to look after. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Iowa reserves his point of order, that this manner of the detailing of army officers for the performance of civil duties is contrary to the genius of our republican institutions.

Mr. BOWERS. Contrary to the interests of a great many contractors. That is what is the matter. [Laughter.]

Mr. PICKLER. The detailing of these army officers to civil positions is not upheld by any report that has ever been made in the investigation of the Indian question, and it is only upheld by an officer here and there having friends in Congress, and who desires to remain in that place. Now, as a general thing army officers do not wish this detail. Their hearts are not in the Indian work. They are army officers. They are concerned in the business of the Army, and so far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of keeping them in the line of army work. I am for the Army; for sustaining the Army. I am in favor of army officers having the widest possible use in the line of their military duty, but I am opposed to their being detailed to the civil service of the Government.

Mr. BOWERS. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. PICKLER. No; the gentleman can never talk sanely on this question. [Laughter.] He is always daft on this line. The reports are all against these army officers being detailed for this service. They are detailed. They are more interested in the real work of an army officer than in this civil work. They are simply detailed to these positions, remain for a time at the agency, and then are detailed somewhere else. The consequence is that they do not become interested in the Indian service. They are not interested in the promotion of the education of the Indians. They are not interested in the development of the Indians like the civilian. The civilian is always appointed by the party in power, and is therefore responsible to his party, responsible to the Indian Commissioner and to the Secretary of the Interior; and it so universally happens that there is scarcely an exception—I speak of it from knowledge, as I have seven agencies in my State—that the civilian gives better satisfaction than an army officer as an agent.

Mr. STEELE. Has the gentleman ever seen any official report that has been made, except one that has been made by some officer of the Indian Department, some gentlemen connected with that Department?

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, yes; General Sherman, years ago, I think, was at the head of that committee. He was a member of the committee of army officers. They went into this question in detail, and they were unanimously against it.

Army officers, Mr. Chairman, do not care for this duty. Occasionally there is one who does. It is put upon them, and there is often friction. I am pretty well up on this question as to how it works. There is continually friction between the army officers and the Secretary of the Interior. The army officer reports and is subject to the Secretary of War, while the Indian agent is under the Secretary of the Interior, and so there is a conflict of jurisdiction all the time.

Mr. BOWERS. Have you heard of any conflicts?

Mr. PICKLER. These army officers ought to remain in the Army. They ought to perform military services; and, as I said, Mr. Chairman, a while ago, by way of query, I believe the Army should not be allowed to encroach upon the civil service, and that we ought to have these Indian agents appointed from civil life. They are appointed by a party that is responsible for them, and are under the Secretary of the Interior, where the Indian work is found. These army officers are under the Secretary of War. If it suits them to obey the Secretary of the Interior they will do so, but if it does not, while they will, perhaps, not altogether refuse to obey orders, they obey the orders one way or the other so as not to violate the orders exactly, and do not carry out the instruction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. STEELE. As the gentleman referred to the committee of which General Sherman was a member, I will state that he spoke in the highest terms of the efficiency of army officers as Indian agents; but what he objected to was the employment, because it was not military employment.

Mr. PICKLER. And that is the best reason in the world, I think. There are some army officers who make good agents, of course.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PICKLER. But in nine cases out of ten the civilian makes a better agent than the army officer.

Mr. HULL. Conceding every word that the gentleman from South Dakota has said is true, that is only a reason why he should bring in a bill and change the law. I raise the point of order against the amendment that it changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

FOR PAY OF ENLISTED MEN.

For pay proper of enlisted men of all grades, $4,235,000: Provided, That hereafter no pay shall be retained.

Mr. BOWERS. I desire to offer an amendment at this point.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to line 4, page 2, the following:
"And provided further, That no part of said sums for pay of officers or enlisted men shall be paid to officers or enlisted men employed in guarding or policing forest reservations or national parks."

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HULL. I shall have to reserve the point of order on that.

Mr. BOWERS. I want to talk on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman reserves his point of order.

Mr. BOWERS. I only want to bring the attention of the House to one fact. Last summer I visited the Sequoia Forest Reservation, in Tulare County, Cal. I traveled to that reservation two days over a mountain road built by the miners at their own expense. I met armed United States troops upon that road, which they had taken possession of to search wagons to see that men did not bring into that reservation guns or fishing tackle unless they had a permit from the officer of the United States Army.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Where was the officer?

Mr. BOWERS. The officer was on the reservation, at the headquarters of the company. I found on the night of the third day, when I arrived at Mineral King, 8,000 or 9,000 feet above the sea, above the timber line, with the exception of a few scrub fir trees, there was a little valley below——

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BOWERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Concerning those permits, is there any regulation which enables people to obtain permits? Is the officer stationed where the public can get access to him?

Mr. BOWERS. He was stationed then at Mineral King, three days' travel from the inhabited country. One can go into that reservation only for about ninety days in the year. The snow falls there from 25 to 30 feet in the winter. Some four or five bodies of soldiers under charge of a sergeant were stationed in different parts of this park to guard it and see that people did not catch fish or kill deer without a permit. No citizen is allowed to go into that reservation to kill deer, but I assert here that the company of soldiers that I found at Mineral King killed 200 deer there this summer. A man who owns several hundred acres of patented lands in that reservation started in last summer to take in a few of his cattle. He was met by these troops and his cattle were driven back down this road out of the reservation and got lost, so that some of them were never recovered. I found the best part of that little valley occupied by troops. They had a nice, easy, splendid time of it. On the way up I passed three heavily loaded six and eight mule teams, drawing up supplies for this company, among which was a very fair amount of beer, perhaps not quite so large a proportion as Shakespeare mentions, of ten barrels to one of bread [laughter], but sufficient.

Mr. CANNON. Was it of good quality?

Mr. BOWERS. I did not sample it. I had something better. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I assert that the right to use the Army of the United States on public highways, built by the people themselves, to keep the people off the public lands, to keep them from enjoying these reservations that have been set apart professedly for the public benefit, is entirely wrong. The proper way to protect these reservations is for the Government to appoint special agents, or deputy marshals, if you please, who can take care of them at an expense of $1 where it now costs $100 by the use of the Army. I am not going to press this amendment at this time, but I want to see whether it is the judgment of this House that the troops of the United States shall be used to meet and drive back citizens upon the roads that the citizens themselves have built, and prevent their going into these public reservations which have been set apart for their benefit.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to enter into any discussion with my friend from California on this question, but conceding all he says to be true, it is his duty to bring in a bill to correct the evil of which he complains instead of trying to amend this bill. I insist upon the point of order that this is absolutely new legislation.

Mr. BOWERS. A word on the point of order, Mr. Chairman. This bill sets apart a certain amount of money for the pay of certain officers, and certain amounts for enlisted men, and then it adds a proviso that no pay shall hereafter be retained. Now, that proviso is simply directing what shall be done with this money that we are appropriating, and my amendment is directly in line with it, and can not be subject to the point of order, because there is no existing law requiring or authorizing troops to be used on these reservations. They have simply been sent there by order of the Department. There is no law providing for it at all.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is mistaken so far as the Yellowstone Park Reservation is concerned. By current law part of a company is stationed there, and very properly.

Mr. BOWERS. I understand that in the case of the Yellowstone Park there has been some special legislation in regard to troops, but that legislation is not general, and we have certainly the right, in appropriating this money, to say what shall be done with it. In this bill the committee have said that this money shall be used for the pay of these men and these officers, and they have also provided that hereafter no pay shall be retained. Now, is not that proviso new legislation?

Mr. HULL. If you want to make a point of order against it, do so.

Mr. BOWERS. I do not; but I say that proviso is subject to the point of order, while my amendment is not, because it is in entire harmony with the existing law.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, the Regulations of the Army provide that the Secretary of War, or the General of the Army, may order troops to any part of the United States, and also provides that those troops shall be paid. Now, the proposition of the gentleman from California is that if they happen to be ordered on this particular reservation they shall not be paid, and therefore it is a proposition to change existing law.

Mr. HULL. It is simply a limitation on the power to use the Army.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, here is a committee charged with the duty of reporting appropriations to this House under existing law, and their duty is thus restricted by the rules of the House, yet they come in here with a bill stuffed full of changes, additions, and modifications of existing law, and they say so frankly and ask the House to allow them to pass, without opposition or criticism, these provisions changing existing law; but when a good, sound, healthy proposition is made by some member, then the most rigid adherence to the rule against new legislation is insisted upon by the chairman of the committee. I point this out, Mr. Chairman, simply to show the singular condition that the Committee of the Whole has got itself into by submitting to the direction of the Committee on Military Affairs on this question of new legislation in this bill.

They are to be the judges of the "new legislation." That is what it amounts to. The trouble is not what was stated by the gentleman from Maine just now, that legislation on appropriation bills is against the public policy of the House; the trouble is that it is against the public policy of the House to legislate upon an appropriation bill except in so far, of course, as the committee reporting the bill may favor such new legislation; and it is against public policy that the Committee of the Whole shall be permitted to have anything to say about it.

Mr. DINGLEY. Oh, I hope the gentleman from Ohio will not put me in any such attitude as that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not say that that was the position of the gentleman from Maine; I simply referred to what he had said about public policy.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has certainly paid very little attention to the proceedings of the Committee of the Whole, or he would not have made the charges and insinuations that he has just made. The Committee on Military Affairs has not asked one thing from this Committee of the Whole that it does not concede to every member of the House of Representatives.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman yield one moment?

Mr. HULL. No; I can not yield now. I wish to say further that we were honest enough to point out in detail every single clause of new legislation embraced in the bill, so that every member of the House could raise objection and have any of these provisions stricken out on a point of order if he wished to raise such a point under the rules. I went over the bill in detail, quoting pages and lines.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Of course you did.

Mr. HULL. So that no man can say that we have been trying to smuggle anything into the bill.

Now, when any member rises here to offer an amendment he is simply doing what he has a perfect right to do, and if no member of the Committee of the Whole desires to raise a point of order on the amendment, it is perfectly proper for the Committee of the Whole to adopt or reject it. But I certainly would not waive my right to raise a point of order against any amendment which might be offered to this bill which I have in charge simply because some other member is opposed to the committee reporting amendments for the action of the House. And, Mr. Chairman, I shall not feel aggrieved if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] should raise a point of order against every provision that the Committee on Military Affairs have reported as new legislation in this bill. We concede that right to him, and after his years of experience in legislation he ought to be willing to concede the same right to the representatives of the different committees of this House. He has no right, in fairness, to use the language he has employed in criticising this committee.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. STEELE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4321) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. 3527) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 4043) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the enrolled bill (S. 879) to amend an act entitled "An act to grant to the Gainesville, McAlester and St. Louis Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory."

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CANNON. Before we resume the consideration of the Army appropriation bill I wish to give a notice. I shall be glad if the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] at some convenient time before 5 o'clock, say half past 4, will move that the committee rise so as to enable me to submit a conference report on the urgent deficiency bill. The report having been adopted by the Senate, I wish to bring it before the House.

Mr. HULL. I shall be glad to comply with the suggestion of the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. I give notice that I will call up this conference report during to-day's session.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. I wish to say that in my judgment it would have been better if the new legislation proposed in this bill had been indicated by italics, so that a person reading the bill could see at once what measures of new legislation the committee reporting the bill had proposed and what were the ordinary appropriations under existing law. As the bill is now printed, no person reading it, unless familiar with this class of legislation, can tell what are the provisions which embrace new legislation.

Mr. HULL. Allow me to state to the gentleman that I went over the bill in order to give this information at the beginning, but I shall take pleasure, as we proceed, in calling the attention of the Committee of the Whole to each provision which is a matter of new legislation.

Mr. RAY. If the new legislation proposed by the committee in this bill is proper to be considered by the House at all—if it is here for our deliberation and for us to say whether we will enact it or not, then, it seems to me, we may do so in any form we may deem proper, without regard to the form which the committee reporting the bill may have adopted. It would be a strange doctrine that when a member of this House undertakes to offer an amendment to a provision which changes existing law, such an amendment is not in order on the ground that it is a change of existing law. The very thing that the pending provision does is to change existing law, and it is held that with such a provision before us we can not change its purport and put it in such a shape as we desire.

Mr. STEELE. In order to settle this question, I make a point of order against this provision.

Mr. HOPKINS. It is too late now to make the point on the new legislation proposed by the committee. That point has been waived, and an amendment to the provision has been moved and discussed.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DOLLIVER). The Chair sustains the point of order on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of Hospital Corps, $206,280: Provided, That there shall be no appointments of hospital stewards until the number of hospital stewards shall be reduced below 100, and thereafter the number of such officers shall be fixed at 100.

Mr. BOWERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOWERS. We understand that these words, on which the point of order was made with reference to retaining pay, remain in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly. No point of order was made against them.

Mr. HOPKINS. I reserve the point of order on the new legislation in the paragraph just read.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I think I must have been very unfortunate in the statement I attempted to make a few moments ago when so astute a member as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] utterly misunderstands what I was trying to get at. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] had inveighed in a general way against an amendment or amendments carrying new legislation in this appropriation bill. The gentleman from Maine, as I understood him, indorsed that proposition very strongly. I discover in looking over the pending bill and listening to the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that there were not less than fourteen, I think it is as I now count them, items of new legislation incorporated in the bill, each one of which is obnoxious to the rules of the House.

I commented on the fact that the committee had disregarded the rules of the House in bringing in the bill; and the chairman himself in his statement admitted that the bill, in the various items to which I have referred and to which he called attention specifically, was in violation of the rules of the House.

Then, his position can only be tolerated on the hypothesis that the new legislation is needful, is valuable to the Government, and that it is necessary to incorporate it upon the bill in this manner, because otherwise there is no possible justification for the additional provisions, which are in derogation of the rules of the House in the first instance. So he comes and presents this proposition to the House: That they have found it necessary, in violation of the rules of the House, to present a very large amount of new legislation. Then I commented on the fact that the moment somebody else attempted to ask the judgment of the House on the important legislation which the committee had added to the bill the point of order was insisted on by the very chairman who had himself offered, as it were, an apology to the House for coming before it with the bill in its present shape, embodying this new legislation.

Now, what I have to add is simply this: That if the committee found the condition of legislation in reference to the Army was so imperfect that in a single bill of this small magnitude they must violate the rules of the House in fourteen or fifteen instances, then they ought to take the judgment of the Committee of the Whole and the other members of the House as to these important matters of legislation which they have seen proper to append to the bill.

I undertake to say, and I repeat this, that the committee either ought to stand by the rules of the House, or else, if they break down the rules of the House by this sort of legislation, they ought to let somebody else be heard as to the necessity of the changes of legislation or the shape of the amendment of the legislation that they themselves propose.

Mr. RAY. May I ask the gentleman if he does not think it entirely proper, if we are to put this amount of new legislation on the bill, to at least permit the members present to amend the new legislation and make it carry out the ideas and wishes of the House?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think that anything short of that would be a most remarkable condition of things. I have been endeavoring to show just what I thought of such a proceeding.

This committee comes and says: Here is new legislation; we propose not only to violate the rules of the House, but we ask you to consent, and if you think some improvement ought to be made, you shall not be permitted to propose it, because we will invoke the rules of the House against you.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the committee ought to rise—the Committee of the Whole—and refuse to sit under such circumstances. [Laughter.]

Mr. PICKLER. If the gentleman will permit me, as I understand the rules of the House no legislation is admissible on an appropriation bill?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is my understanding of the rules.

Mr. PICKLER. Now, when members of the House—those who happen to be members of a committee—bring in an appropriation bill after agreeing upon legislation of this character in the committee room, but refuse, when the matter comes before the House, to allow any other member to offer a suggestion, is it not to the decided disadvantage of every other member in not being allowed to offer anything in the shape of an amendment or suggestion; and does not it give the members of the committee a decided advantage in the framing of such measures?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, I have been trying to show just that, and to show the committee that such was my opinion. If I have not been able to do so, and make myself understood, I will yield to the gentleman from South Dakota. [Laughter.]

Mr. PICKLER. I want to ask further if it is not absolutely out of order, and if it should not be prohibited to the committee, to bring in such matters at all?

Mr. GROSVENOR. In my judgment it is a violation of the rules of the House—a plain, open violation of the rules—and I doubt whether or not a point of order on the bill, when it first came into the House, would not have been sustained on the ground that it was a plain, palpable violation of the rules of the House, and as such admitted by the committee itself.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I have only one thing to say. Of course on the objection of anybody these small changes will be ruled out; but when the War Department comes to the committee and say, as they did in one case or another, "Here is a little thing that everybody will probably agree to," we say to the House, "If you want to violate your own rules by unanimous consent, we make this suggestion and nothing more."

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, is it not equally proper that a member of this Committee of the Whole may suggest some little thing that probably everybody will agree to?

Mr. PARKER. Why, certainly, and we have not objected to that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But there is no discussion allowed. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs makes the point of order that it is new legislation ruthlessly, without considering the rights of anybody else.

Mr. PARKER. I do not think it is fair to say that the chairman of this committee made the point ruthlessly. We have heard two speeches on the various amendments that were proposed. Each gentleman spoke some five minutes upon them. It is not ruthless to invoke the rule if we think it is legislation which is of such importance that it ought to be separately considered.

Mr. PICKLER. When the War Department came to the chairman of the committee and wanted these little changes made, why did not the chairman of your committee answer the War Department as he answers us, by saying, "It is a very easy matter to bring in a bill and pass that law as a separate matter"?

Mr. PARKER. It is a question whether it is a very easy matter to bring in a bill and pass it.

Mr. PICKLER. That is what we think.

Mr. PARKER. There are some of these things that are very small, but if they were put into an army reorganization bill they would be kept back until the end of the session. Here are men who want their pay. This is what we are talking about now. They are kept out of their pay. This is what we are considering now. They are kept out of their pay, and I never thought that anybody in this whole House would object to this.

Mr. PICKLER. We do not complain particularly, at least I do not, of the committee reporting the amendments, but what we do complain of is that when you report an amendment, and then we offer an amendment to that, although it is germane to that amendment which you bring in as new legislation, you put us out on a point of order, without any consideration.

Mr. PARKER. I will answer that in a word. The committee report a proviso that men's pay shall not be retained. You put in an amendment as to how those men shall be used and where they shall be sent. That would destroy the Army, to take the power out of the hands of the Commander in Chief, the President. It is not germane, and I want to say that the committee will not complain if anybody in this House objects to any one of these things which the committee have offered. They are only suggestions to the House to be passed by unanimous consent. On the other hand, the committee are compelled to reserve the right to raise the point of order when a matter that is doubtful is brought up. One of these questions was the use of officers in the guarding of public parks. The other was the use of officers as Indian agents. These were questions that we might discuss for hours. It is a question of the organization and use of the Army. We must retain our right to use our discretion, as every member of the Committee of the Whole has the right to object to any proviso which is not considered a proper subject of unanimous consent.

Mr. PICKLER. Why should not the House pass on them?

Mr. PARKER. Because it would delay the House and occupy its time. We do not want to have the House delayed by a long discussion, but we are ready to have anybody object to anything that we have brought in.

Mr. PICKLER. The Appropriations Committee take up nearly all the time of the House anyhow.

Mr. PARKER. Only when there is discussion of proposed amendments; but if our amendments or those of anyone else are objected to and ruled out, it is all right.

Mr. HOPKINS. I reserved a point of order against the new legislation here, but I should like to have the chairman of the committee explain why this legislation is proposed.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. HOPKINS. It is new legislation.

Mr. HULL. I understand you reserve the point, but you do not make it. If you insist upon it I do not want to say a word.

Mr. HOPKINS. No, I reserve it.

Mr. HULL. The proviso commencing on line 6 and ending in line 10, on page 2, is new legislation. It reduces the number of hospital stewards to 100. It was done at the suggestion of the Surgeon-General of the Army, who has charge of the hospital stewards. He states that on account of the consolidation of posts they will not need to exceed 100 hospital stewards, and that they were now making no additional appointments. The law now authorizes 112 hospital stewards; and the Surgeon-General further stated that after the further consolidation of posts which is going on the number could in a few years be reduced below 100, but that at this time no injury could come to the service by limiting the number to 100.

Mr. PICKLER. Now, I want to say——

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman allow me right there? Under existing law if these posts are consolidated they are not required to appoint any more hospital stewards than they have posts.

Mr. HULL. They can appoint 112 hospital stewards whether they have 112 posts or not.

Mr. HOPKINS. I understand that. But suppose they only had 60 posts; they would require but 60 hospital stewards. Now, they are not required by law to keep the full quota of 112 in the service, are they?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HULL. That is a point I would not want to determine. They have 112, but do not want any more than 100. The idea of the committee was that they should make no more appointments until the number was reduced to 100.

Mr. HOPKINS. If the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana be correct, that under existing law they are compelled to pay 112 hospital stewards, I should be in favor of this amendment; but if my construction of the law be correct, if we are only compelled to appoint the number of stewards that we have posts in the country, then I see no reason for this new legislation. Now, it may be that under existing conditions we do not need the number that are limited by the law; but it seems to me that it would be better to leave that point so that if at any time in the future we increase this arm of the Government service and increase the number of posts in the country we will not be compelled to come to Congress to get permission by new legislation to appoint these hospital stewards. Now, my understanding is this: That under the law at the present time we are not compelled to appoint any more of these members of the service than we have posts, and I think it is much better for the service to leave the law as it is than to limit it as is proposed in this amendment of the bill; and therefore I raise the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

And said clerks and messengers shall be employed and apportioned to the several headquarters, stations, and inspection districts by the Secretary of War.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to a change in the existing law.

In lines 4 and 5 the words "and inspection districts" are inserted. It is done to cover the case of New York, where the inspection district is in the city and the headquarters of the army is at Governors Island.

Mr. DOCKERY. No one has made a point of order.

Mr. HULL. I know; but some gentlemen say they want to know where the new legislation is.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pay Department: For pay of officers in the Pay Department, as now authorized and provided by law, $74,000.

For additional pay to such officers for length of service, to be paid with their current monthly pay, $22,200.

In all, $96,200: Provided, That hereafter all appointments made in the Pay Department of the Army shall be made by selection from the line of the Army.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I raise the point of order against this last paragraph.

Mr. HULL. It is new legislation, and it would have to go out on a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

RETIRED ENLISTED MEN.

For pay of the enlisted men of the Army on the retired list, $386,287.25: Provided, That hereafter a monthly allowance of $9.50 be granted in lieu of the allowance for subsistence and clothing.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the fact that the proviso here is new legislation. It is put in at the request of the Paymaster-General for the purpose of simplification of the books.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a single observation. Some criticism has been made in connection with the fact that legislation is carried by this bill. I can speak disinterestedly, except, perhaps, as to one paragraph. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say this in reply to that criticism: In my judgment it is exceedingly important for committees having in charge appropriation bills now and then to report wise administrative legislation, inasmuch as this is usually the only way in which you can enact such legislation into law.

Now, then, so far as I am concerned, I am disposed upon all of these merely administrative questions to follow the judgment of the committee having the matter in charge, especially a committee reporting a bill which has both the legislative authority and the authority to appropriate. I am not prepared to say that all these administrative provisos found in this bill are wise. There is no question that points of order will lie under our rules, but before they are interposed I suggest to the members of the committee that we ought to be very sure we are right, because for more than twenty years some of the best and wisest administrative provisions that have gone into our statutes have gone there on appropriation bills. It may, perhaps, be said in answer that some of the worst have also gone on appropriation bills. That may be true; but as a rule, so far as this body is concerned, provisions that have thus been enacted into law have first been carefully considered by a committee of this House. Now, then, this bill being in charge of a gentleman who is noted for his conservatism, I trust that unless the exigency seems to be sufficient members will refrain from raising points of order.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. PICKLER. Suppose it is conceded that it is a proper thing for these committees to report legislation?

Mr. DOCKERY. I said mere administrative legislation.

Mr. PICKLER. Well, confine it as you like. Now, what does the gentleman say when these measures are reported as to the rights of members who are not on the committee to offer germane amendments to the amendments proposed?

Mr. DOCKERY. I say this, that unless a point of order is interposed, any legislation upon the bill will be subject to amendment, provided the amendment is germane to the proposition in the bill.

Mr. PICKLER. I do not think anybody has complained about this committee reporting new legislation on the bill, but what does excite complaint is the fact that although these amendments changing existing law are reported by committees bringing in bills, the practice is almost universal for the gentleman in charge of a bill to make a point of order against any amendment that may be offered by a member on the floor, so as to confine us entirely to the consideration of the report of the committee.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I will say in defense of the committee that about everything new we have recommended in this bill is purely administrative. We have not tried to change existing laws except in two cases—one with reference to the paymasters and the other relating to the payment of officers on duty with troops for commutation quarters. The provision in regard to hospital stewards is clearly administrative; the provision in regard to pay for clothing and rations is purely administrative. That is the character of all the changes that we have recommended; and I want to say to my friend from South Dakota that if he had something that he thought the committee ought to have reported in this bill it would have been very little trouble for him to have appeared before the committee and stated it, but we did not have the pleasure of seeing him there. I want to say further that to suddenly spring new legislation in regard to the Army upon the Committee of the Whole without its having received any consideration whatever by a committee of the House, or by the War Department, and to ask the Committee on Military Affairs to consent to it is not fair.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I am not complaining of this committee to-day any more than I complain of other committees. It is futile for the gentleman to say that if I had anything to suggest I ought to have gone before his committee. I have too much to do to run around suggesting every little amendment that occurs to me on any subject. But here to-day I have suggested an amendment providing that army officers shall not be detailed as Indian agents, and I would like to have a vote upon it. The proposition is germane; it is in order; it is one that requires no elaborate consideration by a committee, and I would like to have a vote upon it. And by the way, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to our rule as it stands. I think it is a bad rule. I very much prefer the one which prevailed in the last House. I hold that it is just as suitable to legislate on an appropriation bill as upon any other bill, and that if general legislation on appropriation bills were prohibited only during the last fifteen days of a session of Congress there would be no danger whatever in it. The only danger there is in legislating upon appropriation bills is in the expiring hours of a session of Congress, but up to within two weeks of the end of a session, when we are considering these appropriation bills and have plenty of time, I think it would be entirely proper to enact legislation in that way.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I call for the regular order.

Mr. PICKLER. I have the floor, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. STEELE. What amendment is the gentleman speaking to?

Mr. PICKLER. I do not yield the floor. I am speaking in my own time to this amendment.

Mr. STEELE. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. PICKLER. I am speaking to the paragraph.

Mr. STEELE. I make the point that there is no matter before the committee.

Mr. PICKLER. I am speaking to the paragraph.

Mr. STEELE. What paragraph?

Mr. PICKLER. The last one that was read. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman has made no motion on which to found a speech.

Mr. PICKLER. I do not need to make a motion. The gentleman ought to know that I do not have to make a motion.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a ruling upon the point of order. If the gentleman is speaking to any question before the committee, I should like to know it.

Mr. PICKLER. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that I shall be protected in my rights. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. No amendment has been offered.

Mr. PICKLER. I am speaking on the last paragraph read.

Mr. STEELE. But the gentleman has made no motion.

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, well, if the gentleman is so technical, I move to strike out the last word, and now I want five minutes from this time. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman can not have it.

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, I can.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WASHINGTON. How many times can a gentleman be recognized to speak on the same subject?

Mr. PICKLER. This is a new amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the gentleman from South Dakota have unlimited time.

Mr. PICKLER. I do not yield to the gentleman. I have the floor. There are occasions in this House when a member can retain the floor even against a man in charge of an appropriation bill, and I claim that right now. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, the rule as it at present prevails makes it almost impossible for us to secure desirable legislation. It is all well enough for the gentleman from Iowa to say to me, "Bring in your little bill providing that a military officer shall not be detailed as an Indian agent"; but what does that suggestion amount to? What I complain of is that we are too much narrowed down. I believe there would be no danger arising from legislation on appropriation bills if the prohibition against such legislation were confined, for instance, to the last two weeks of the session. But under the rule as it is at present we are absolutely deprived of the opportunity to legislate on many important subjects connected with these appropriation bills.

Some gentlemen here seem to think that we are directing our attacks against this committee especially. We are not doing so. The point I am trying to make is this: That when the committee in charge of one of these bills has reported a particular provision, and in the Committee of the Whole a germane amendment to that provision is offered, the chairman of the committee reporting the bill should not get up and arbitrarily make a point of order against any such amendment, denying to the friends of the proposition an opportunity to be heard. That is what I complain of.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied that the Committee on Military Affairs have not the slightest desire to curtail in any way the prerogatives of our friend from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER]. It seems to me that the discussion in which he has just indulged might have been more appropriate when the rules were under consideration. That was the proper time to discuss the propriety of the rule which now prohibits him or any other member from offering an amendment in the shape of general legislation upon an appropriation bill. It is not the fault of the Committee on Military Affairs that we have such a rule.

Mr. PICKLER. I am not blaming that committee.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Furthermore, it seems to me, as a very quiet observer, that the chairman of the committee has not cut off any of the rights of the gentleman from South Dakota by pressing his point of order. The gentleman from South Dakota has been heard repeatedly; and the chairman withheld his point of order especially to hear the eloquence of our friend, which is always enjoyed by the House. I am sure if the gentleman will examine carefully into the new legislation embraced in this bill, he will be convinced of the truth of what has been stated, that it is almost entirely administrative, and all of it is in the interest of economy and retrenchment. I know the gentleman is an economist.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. PICKLER. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For commutation of quarters to commissioned officers on duty, without troops, at stations where there are no public quarters, $210,725.48: Provided, That hereafter, in case the public quarters at any station are so full as to prevent the assignment of quarters in kind to a commissioned officer there stationed on duty with troops, commutation of quarters at the usual rates shall be paid to him as is now authorized by law to officers on duty without troops; the question of inadequacy of quarters in each case to be determined by the Secretary of War.

Mr. HOPKINS. Reserving a point of order on this provision, I would like to have from the chairman of the committee an explanation of this new legislation.

Mr. CANNON. Why not have a ruling on the point of order?

Mr. HOPKINS. It may be that we shall all acquiesce in the provision.

Mr. CANNON. No, sir.

Mr. HULL. I am ready to let the Chair rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the point of order insisted upon?

Mr. HOPKINS. Not by me.

Mr. CANNON. I make the point of order.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I also make the point of order, because I believe that this provision, in addition to being new legislation, is mischievous legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For mileage to officers when traveling on duty without troops, when authorized by law, not to exceed $140,000, to be allotted by the Secretary of War to the War Department and to the several military departments; and not more than three-fifths of said amount shall be expended during the first half of the fiscal year, and not more than one-half of the remainder during each of the remaining quarters: Provided, That hereafter the maximum sum to be allowed and paid to any officer of the Army shall be 4 cents per mile, distance to be computed over the shortest usually traveled routes, and in addition thereto the cost of the transportation actually paid by the officer over said route or routes, exclusive of parlor-car or sleeping-car fare: And provided further, That when an officer so traveling shall travel in whole or in part on any railroad on which the troops and supplies of the United States are entitled to be transported free of charge, or over any of the bond-aided Pacific railroads, he shall be allowed for himself only 4 cents per mile as a subsistence fund for every mile necessarily traveled over any such railroad: And provided further, That the transportation furnished by the Quartermaster's Department to officers traveling without troops shall be limited to transportation in kind, not including sleeping or parlor car accommodations, over free roads, over bond-aided Pacific railroads, and by conveyance belonging to said Department, and the Secretary of War shall so apportion this sum as to prevent a deficiency therein: And provided further, That advance mileage may be paid for all distances over 2,000 miles, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may provide.

Mr. HULL. I desire to call attention to the fact that in line 11 of the paragraph just read we have left out the words "and transfer." If these words be not inserted the Government will pay the expense of transferring these officers from one place to another.

Mr. HOPKINS. Why is that change made?

Mr. HULL. It is a small affair; and the change was made at the instance of the Inspector-General of the Army. These officers are now compelled to bear that expense themselves.

Mr. HOPKINS. But the allowance of 4 cents a mile is more than they are compelled to pay for transportation, is it not?

Mr. HULL. I believe so. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to further new legislation in this paragraph. I refer to the provision beginning at the bottom of page 9:

And provided further, That advance mileage may be paid for all distances over 2,000 miles, under regulations as the Secretary of War may provide.

This is new legislation.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is new legislation, and I am afraid legislation that is not healthful. I wish to reserve a point of order for a few moments until we can understand this matter further.

As will be recollected, the law provides absolutely that no advance of public money shall be made to any other person than a disbursing officer, who is a bonded officer. I have never known any such legislation as this, proposing that the Government advance money to a person not a disbursing officer—not under bond. I am a little afraid of this kind of legislation.

Mr. HULL. Very well, then, make a point of order upon it.

Mr. DINGLEY. But if it is proper legislation I do not want to raise a point of order.

Mr. HULL. We believed that it would relieve a very worthy class of officers of the burden of having to borrow money to pay expenses of this kind when they are transferred from one place to another.

Mr. DINGLEY. But under existing law no officials anywhere have money advanced to them except disbursing officers, who, as I have said, are under bond.

Mr. HULL. The officers of the Inspector-General's Department are placed at a great disadvantage in the absence of such a provision as this.

Mr. DINGLEY. This is a departure, however, from the uniform policy of the Government.

Mr. HULL. If an inspector, for instance, is sent from Washington to California to inspect a post, he has got to advance the money to take him there. The statement of the Inspector-General was that they are in many cases poor men, and have to borrow this money at high interest.

Mr. STEELE. In order to save time I will make the point of order on the paragraph that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SUBSISTENCE DEPARTMENT.

Subsistence of the Army—Purchase of subsistence supplies: For issue, as rations to troops, civil employees, when entitled thereto, hospital matrons, general prisoners at posts, prisoners of war (including Indians held by the Army as prisoners, but for whose subsistence appropriation is not otherwise made), estimated for the fiscal year on the basis of 9,746,230 rations; for sales to officers and enlisted men of the Army; for authorized issues of candles; for toilet articles, barbers', laundry, and tailors' materials, for use of general prisoners confined at military posts without pay or allowances, and recruits at recruiting stations, to be issued under regulations as prescribed by the Secretary of War; of matches for lighting public fires and lights at posts and stations and in the field; of flour used for paste in target practice; of salt and vinegar for public animals; of issues to Indians visiting military posts, and to Indians employed with the Army, without pay, as guides and scouts. For payments: For meals for recruiting parties and recruits; for hot coffee, canned beef, and baked beans for troops traveling, when it is impracticable to cook their rations; for scales, weights, measures, utensils, tools, stationery, 3,000 cookbooks, blank books and forms, printing, advertising, commercial newspapers, use of telephones, office furniture; for temporary buildings, cellars, and other means of protecting subsistence supplies (when not provided by the Quartermaster's Department); for extra pay to enlisted men employed on extra duty in the Subsistence Department for periods of not less than ten days, at rates fixed by law; for compensation of civilians employed in the Subsistence Department, not exceeding $100,000; and for other necessary expenses incident to the purchase, care, preservation, issue, sale, and accounting for subsistence supplies for the Army. For the payment of the regulation allowances for commutation in lieu of rations; to enlisted men on furlough, to ordnance sergeants on duty at ungarrisoned posts, to enlisted men stationed at places where rations in kind can not be economically issued, to enlisted men traveling on detached duty when it is impracticable to carry rations of any kind, to enlisted men selected to contest for places or prizes in department and army rifle competitions while traveling to and from places of contest; to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War; in all, $1,650,000.

Mr. HULL. In line 24 on page 10, commencing with the word "for," down to and including the second line on page 11, providing for the issue of toilet articles and so on for the use of prisoners, is new legislation.

Mr. PAYNE. How have these been provided for before?

Mr. HULL. They were heretofore confined in the military prison. But the military prison has been turned over to the Department of Justice. This is necessary to provide for such cases.

And then, on page 11, line 13, there is the insertion of 3,000 cookbooks, which I explained before. This is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clothing, and camp and garrison equipage: For cloth, woolens, materials, and for the manufacture of clothing for the Army, for issue and for sale at cost price according to the Army Regulations; for altering and fitting clothing, and washing and cleaning when necessary; for equipage and for expenses of packing and handling and similar necessaries; for a suit of citizens' outer clothing, to cost not exceeding $10, to be issued upon release from confinement to each prisoner who has been confined under a court-martial sentence involving dishonorable discharge, $1,050,000.

Mr. HULL. There is new legislation in this provision—that relating to citizens' clothing for prisoners.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Before the gentleman proceeds will he allow me to make a suggestion to him? On page 18 of the bill, in line 6, the following paragraph occurs:

Provided, That such compensation shall be computed upon the basis of the tariff or lower special rates for like transportation performed for the public at large, etc.

I suggest to him that he strike out the word "tariff" where it appears in this provision and insert "charges." The use of the word tariff in this connection is a misuse of a well-understood term.

Mr. HULL. We have already passed that provision of the bill. I do not know that there is any special objection to it. If the gentleman asks unanimous consent to go back, I shall not object, and let him take the sense of the committee on striking it out.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. I ask unanimous consent that the word "tariff" be stricken out and "charges" substituted.

Mr. HULL. I do not consent to the amendment, Mr. Chairman, but I have no objection to going back. That word has stood in the appropriation bills for a great many years, and its meaning is well understood. It is as well defined as anything else in the bill.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I object to the word being stricken out.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. I withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. HULL. With reference to the paragraph just read by the Clerk, beginning with line 14, the provision in line 20 for a suit of citizens' outer clothing at a cost not exceeding $10 for each prisoner under a court-martial sentence, is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For firing the morning and evening gun at military posts prescribed by General Orders No. 70, Headquarters of the Army, dated July 23, 1867, and at National Homes Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, including material for cartridges, bags, etc., $20,000.

Mr. HULL. That provision for the firing of the morning and evening guns at the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers is new legislation.

The Clerk read as follows:

Manufacture, repairing, procuring, and issuing arms at the national armories, $400,000: Provided, That this appropriation shall be applicable to the manufacture of the magazine arm recommended for trial by the Board recently in session, and approved by the Secretary of War.

Mr. HULL. I desire to offer an amendment to this part of the bill, after the word "War," line 21.

This is an amendment that was left out in the preparation of the bill. It is simply the same provision that has been enacted the last two Congresses and is recommended by the Chief of the Ordnance Bureau.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That not more than $60,000 of the money appropriated for the Ordnance Department in all its branches shall be applied to the payment of civilian clerks in said Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendments, and recommend that as amended it do pass.

Mr. MERCER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Iowa, the chairman of the committee, if by that he means to conclude all action on this bill?

Mr. HULL. That would conclude all action on the bill.

Mr. MERCER. I have an amendment which I desire to offer, on page 24.

Mr. HULL. We have passed page 24. The bill is finished.

Mr. MERCER. I ask unanimous consent of the House to offer the amendment.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman submit his amendment for information? I should prefer to hear it before I consent to return to that page.

Mr. MERCER. I was busily engaged in writing the amendment and did not know that we had got so far along with the bill. My proposed amendment is this:

On page 4, line 21, after the word "War," add:

"Provided further, That so much of the above sum as may be necessary shall be expended by the Secretary of War for the purchase of cadet rifles to be supplied to boards of education or other proper authorities in cities where military instruction has been introduced in the public schools, on condition that such boards of education or other proper authorities shall furnish a good and sufficient bond, to be approved by the Secretary of War, for the care, custody, and safe return of such cadet rifles."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, as that would involve a large expenditure that the committee could not pass upon in the House without having a great deal more information, I shall have to object to returning to that page, and insist upon my motion that the committee rise. The gentleman can have that proposition submitted in the Senate.

Mr. MERCER. Asking the indulgence of the committee, I have a proposition milder in form. I have a double-barreled shotgun here, Mr. Chairman. I have two amendments, and I desire to submit the second one to the gentleman's generosity. It is as follows:

On page 24, line 21, after the word "war," add:

"Provided further, That the Secretary of War shall distribute the discarded rifles, or so many thereof as may be necessary, among the boards of education or other proper authorities in cities where military instruction has been introduced on condition that an application therefor be made by such boards of education or other proper authorities accompanied by a good and sufficient bond to be approved by the Secretary of War for the care, custody, and return to the Government of such rifles."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I prefer to have the gentleman go to the Senate with that. I shall have to insist on the motion that the committee rise. It is late, and the Committee on Appropriations have a conference report which they wish to present.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made to returning to this part of the bill, the Chair holds that the amendment is offered too late, and the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, that the committee rise.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MERCER. Division.

Mr. HULL. I hope the gentleman will not insist on a division.

Mr. MERCER. I withdraw my request.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DOLLIVER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5359) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, and with the recommendation that as amended the bill do pass.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, presents a conference report, which the Clerk will report to the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4321) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 5, 6, 15, 20, and 31.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 9, 11, 12, 13, 14, 18, 19, 21, 22, 24, 25, 27, 28, 29, 30, 32, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, and 62, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"To open Jupiter Inlet, in Florida, for the passage of boats and small vessels, to be expended under the direction of the Chief of Engineers, $500."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 17, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment insert "$25,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment insert "$9,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 26, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment insert "$3,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed in the amended paragraph insert "$400"; and the Senate agree to the same.

J. G. CANNON,
S. A. NORTHWAY,
JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

EUGENE HALE,
W. B. ALLISON,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the statement of the House conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill (H. R. 4321) submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The bill as finally agreed upon appropriates $6,305,436.52, being $1,884,033.91 more than as it passed the House; $300,000 of which sum, however, was added by the House when the bill was last under consideration, for the publication of the Agricultural Report for 1895.

All of the amendments are agreed to without change, except the following:

On amendment numbered 5, $20,000 is appropriated, as proposed by the House, instead of $25,000, as proposed by the Senate, to complete the survey of the international boundary between the United States and Mexico.

On amendment numbered 6, the appropriation of $10,000 proposed by the Senate for the publication of the report of Dr. E. A. Mearns on the natural history of the region covered by the boundary survey between the United States and Mexico is stricken out.

On amendment numbered 15, the appropriation of $7,000 proposed by the Senate for completing the improvement of roads owned by the United States at Antietam is stricken out.

On amendment numbered 17, the sum of $25,000, instead of $30,000, as proposed by the Senate, is given for the purchase of horses for cavalry and artillery for the Army.

On amendment numbered 20: Strikes out the appropriation of $4,000 proposed by the Senate for coaling shed at the naval station at Key West, Fla.

J. G. CANNON,
S. A. NORTHWAY,
JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the report briefly states the result of the conference. It is proper for me to add that, substantially, the House conferees recommend a report that carries the Senate amendments. I stated when the Senate amendments were under consideration before the House I apprehended that most, if not all, of them abounded in estimate. We found that to be the fact when we met the Senate conferees. In other words, we found that after the urgent deficiency bill had been considered in the House and had passed the House the Executive Departments forwarded additional estimates for the service of the current year and deficiencies for past years that increased the bill as indicated. As the money was either due or necessary to carry on the Government, the House conferees recommend that the House accede in the main to the Senate amendments, with the exceptions we have indicated in the report. I want at this time to protest that it seems to me that it is the duty of those who submit estimates connected with the Administration to obey the law and submit them as the law requires them to submit them, in ample time, so that they may receive consideration before the body that prepares general appropriation bills.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, just a few words. I desire very briefly to call the attention of the House to the fact that in this bill there are carried many items which, properly speaking, are not deficiencies. Three items aggregate $830,000, and neither one of them can be considered as a deficiency. I, however, fully concur in the report which has just been read and in what has been said by the gentleman from Illinois. They are very proper and very necessary appropriations; but at the same time they are not deficiencies. For instance, an appropriation of $300,000 for printing the Agricultural Report for 1894 is an unusual appropriation.

In the last session of the last Congress an appropriation of $300,000 was made for printing the Agricultural Report for 1894; and there was no estimate to that Congress for printing the report of 1895. This is the first time, with the exception of one other instance some years ago, where a Congress had failed to make any appropriation at all for the purpose, where we will have two appropriations for printing two Agricultural Reports at the same session of Congress. The reason for this appropriation is that it will enable the Public Printer to get out the Agricultural Report for 1895 about the month of June instead of in October or November. I therefore concur in it, although it is not properly a deficiency appropriation.

There is another appropriation—for Brooklyn dockyard, $50,000—which is not a deficiency. It is an appropriation to enable the Secretary of the Navy to amend a contract which has already been entered into and which if executed would not require an additional appropriation. I have recognized the importance of this appropriation and have agreed to it, and think that the House also ought to agree to it.

For the Library of Congress building we have an appropriation of $480,000. The officer in charge of the construction of this building says that not one penny of this money will be expended during the present fiscal year, and that the appropriation made by the last Congress will not be entirely expended before July 1 next; but either this appropriation should be made or authority should be given to him to contract in order that the building may be entirely completed and turned over to Congress in February next. If this appropriation should be delayed until the passage of the sundry civil bill, upon which it would regularly appear, then the building would not be completed until some time in the coming spring or summer.

I have called the attention of the House to these particular items, in order that no one might think that this very large urgent deficiency bill is a result of any dereliction on the part of last Congress to make the necessary appropriations. My judgment is, as I have heretofore stated, that there will upon the whole be smaller appropriations for deficiencies at this session of Congress than for many years past. There are other appropriations in the bill which are not deficiencies, but I will not delay the House further by reference to them.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CANNON. I will yield to the gentleman in a moment. I desire to say that the gentleman from Texas and myself do not disagree about it being necessary for the public service at this time to make these appropriations.

Mr. SAYERS. Not at all. We are in entire harmony as to their necessity.

Mr. CANNON. That is all I desire to say about that, except as to the Agricultural Report. The sundry civil appropriation bill for the current year for the first time carries the appropriation for the Agricultural Report—the publication thereof, of 1894. That was made necessary by the passage of the Richardson printing act. Prior to that time every appropriation of that kind was by joint resolution reported from the Committee on Printing. But for the change of that law it would not be necessary to have it come upon the sundry civil bill. The report for 1894 has been published. Now this item comes upon this deficiency bill because of the Richardson printing act which provides for the publication—a fixed law—of the Agricultural and other departmental reports. If that law had not passed, why then, following the usual course, this appropriation ought to have been made, and would have been made, by a separate joint resolution covering one item.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SAYERS. Just one moment. Mr. Speaker, I think either the gentleman from Illinois misunderstood what I said or that he has not retained in his recollection the appropriations made heretofore for the publication of the Agricultural Report. The fact that I desired to impress upon the House was this: That until, I believe, the first session of the Fifty-first Congress, there never have been two appropriations, either by joint resolution or upon appropriation bills, for the publication of Agricultural Reports at any one session of Congress, and two appropriations were then made only because at the last session of the Fiftieth Congress there was a failure to make any appropriation at all for the purpose. There was, as I have said, an appropriation for the publication of the Agricultural Report at the last session of the last Congress, and it was carried, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois, upon the sundry civil bill.

Now, the Public Printer comes to Congress and says: "If you will give the appropriation for 1895 at this time, instead of waiting for the sundry civil bill, I shall be able to give you the Agricultural Report for 1895 in June, instead of in October or November next."

Mr. CANNON. There is, as I understand it, substantially no disagreement between the gentleman from Texas and myself?

Mr. SAYERS. None at all.

Mr. CANNON. I will state again that the Agricultural Report for 1894 was printed by virtue of an item in the sundry civil bill instead of, as theretofore, by authority of a joint resolution reported from the Committee on Printing. Now, the report of 1895 dwells in this deficiency bill instead of dwelling in a separate joint resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Inasmuch as the gentleman has referred to the printing bill, I wish he would state to the House that there is no increase in the amount of the appropriation by reason of the change.

Mr. CANNON. None at all.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And that the amount is identically the same in this bill as it would be in the other.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly. It is fixed by law.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Mr. Speaker, when this bill came from the Senate, I asked the chairman of the committee about item No. 11. I wish to inquire now whether the committee of conference inquired into facts relating to that matter, as to whether the report had been made in due form, by due authority, and according to law. My information is that it has not been so made, and I ask the chairman of the conference committee now whether that particular item was inquired into by his committee?

Mr. CANNON. In answer to the gentleman I have to state that upon inquiry we found that the money that was appropriated for the national commission, and was intended in part to cover the making of the report, had been used in paying the expense of bringing the commission together, which cost something over $20,000, and that, so far as the report was concerned, no money was left to pay for it. There was no means of calling the commission together again, because there was no money to pay the members for coming together. We found that the director-general eighteen months ago, with this condition of things existing and the law making it his duty to make a report, went to work and spent a year and a half upon it, calling to his assistance such aid as was necessary.

Counting his own pay at $5,000 a year, the eighteen months made $7,500, which is paid him by this appropriation, and the committee ascertained that the balance, to make the $18,000, was actually paid out for clerical assistance. This report of the director-general had not been delivered to anybody, because there was nobody to deliver it to. The committee on the part of the Senate, and the House committee also, examined into the matter far enough to be satisfied that the director-general had honestly and intelligently made this expenditure, and he desired to make some disposition of the report and to be reimbursed. It seemed to the committee of conference, the managers on the part of the House as well as those on the part of the Senate, that there was equity in his claim. Therefore we recommend concurrence substantially in the Senate provision, and the provision as recommended by the committee of conference leaves the report of the director-general in the hands of the Joint Committee on Printing.

Now, let me go one step further. The president of the national commission has not yet made any report. We looked into that just far enough to ascertain that there is a great mass of undigested material, covering, particularly, I presume, the action of the board of awards, material which has not been edited, although there was nearly $2,000 advanced for editing it; and we recommend the payment of that. The women's commission (if that is the correct name of it), headed by Mrs. Palmer, has not yet made a report, but we understand in a general way that there is sufficient appropriation to that board to enable it to make a report.

Now, my own belief is, from such representations as have been made to me, that the report of the director-general, covering the matters that it does, is in very good shape. We do not authorize any publication of the report. We only provide for reimbursement of the director-general by this appropriation, and leave his report in the possession of the Joint Committee on Printing of the House and the Senate, expecting and hoping that later all the material will come into possession of that joint committee, upon which are found as members the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. PERKINS, the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. RICHARDSON, and one other member of the House, and Senator HALE in the Senate. Knowing these to be industrious gentlemen and quite competent, we hope and expect that such steps will be taken as will lead to the full examination of the report of the director-general and a full inquiry as to the material that exists elsewhere, and will finally lead to an intelligent editing of a report, doing justice to everybody, care being taken that there shall be no duplications in the report, having regard also to the number of volumes that ought to be published and what the report ought to contain.

Mr. SAYERS. Will my friend allow me a moment right there? I wish to supplement what he has said, possibly by restating what he has already said, by remarking that the only thing that has been done by the committee of conference in this matter has been to provide for repaying the director-general moneys that he has absolutely expended and for receiving his work and transmitting it to the Joint Committee on Printing, leaving that committee to make such adjustment between the different parties as to the preparation of the final report and for its publication as in their wisdom may seem proper.

Mr. CANNON. And the gentleman might add, expecting that that committee later on, after they have looked into the matter, will originate and submit for the consideration of the House and the Senate such recommendations with reference to legislation and appropriation as they may deem proper.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah rose.

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Utah five or ten minutes, or any reasonable time he may desire.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to detain the House any great length of time, and I have not the temerity to suppose that what I shall say will make any difference as to the adoption or rejection of this report. I do not mean to cast any reflection upon either the director-general of the Columbian Exposition or upon the committee that has reported in favor of this appropriation. But I do submit, after the labored explanations—if I may use the expression—of my eminent friend, I can not see that there is any reason for permitting this appropriation to be made at this time.

The subject has not been before this body or any of its standing committees. It has not been before any committee of the House, so that it could be fully investigated, and from the explanation we have it is evident that here is a report upon an exposition held under the authority of the United States which is not authoritative. It has not stamped upon it the authority of anybody. Yet if this appropriation be made and this report gets into the hands of the Printing Committee it becomes authoritative; it will be printed and put forth as embodying the views of that commission when it does not contain their views, so far as we know, but simply the views of the director-general of the commission. As I am informed—I have not been able to see the report—it is not even signed. It has not been put forth by the authority of the commission, yet under these circumstances we are asked to appropriate money to its author. I submit that this matter ought to be fully investigated, and before we make an appropriation of more than $18,000 to pay for this work we ought to be in a position to know what it is and by whose authority it has been made.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Speaker, a word in reply. The gentleman is mistaken when he speaks of this matter not having been before any committee of this House. It was before the Committee on Appropriations when the Senate amendments were referred. It was considered in the House by unanimous consent when we acted on the question of nonconcurrence. It was considered as fully as was practicable in the committee of conference, the result of whose deliberations has been given to the House.

The gentleman speaks of my "labored explanation." Well, sir, I have at times worked harder than in making this explanation. The gentleman says that this report of the director-general was not made to the national commission, and that it is without authority. I admit that it was not made to the national commission; and I think I have progressed far enough to be certain that there never will be a report made by the director-general or anybody else to the national commission. That commission is functus officio, unless Congress should breathe the breath of life into it and call its members from various points throughout the length and breadth of the land—I will not say as the prophet, by breathing upon them, called the dry bones together in the valley. But after all, while that required the spirit of the Lord, Congress can not call the national commission together without an expenditure of $20,000, and I believe I know that an expenditure of $20,000 for that purpose would be thrown away.

The exposition has been held. It was a magnificent success. It has passed into history. The report should be made. The director-general has made this expenditure, and we believe has wisely made it; and he ought to be reimbursed. By the provision now submitted we lodge this report with the Joint Committee on Printing, as I have already explained, that that committee may take it, examine it, go into the whole question of preparing these reports for publication, for the proper editing of the same. That committee, after an examination which is in their line and which I have no doubt they will take the time to make, will report to this House, I believe, such apt provision as will give us a reliable report of that exposition and an economical one.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. CANNON. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. As I understand, the gentleman's position is that the Committee on Printing of this House can properly edit this report of the Columbian Exposition?

Mr. CANNON. In my judgment the joint Committee on Printing, with this report of the director-general and with such other information as it may be able to obtain, can devise a scheme that will bring about a proper report, can tell us how much it will cost and how large it ought to be.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Is it understood that this conference report proposes an appropriation for the printing of this report?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; this appropriation is merely to reimburse the director-general $18,000.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Then, as I understand, this is a matter about which there is nothing in dispute—as to which there is no issue here.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois, with his long experience and great abitity in these matters, if he would venture to offer a word of suggestion or advice to the Joint Committee on Printing as to how far they might go in their recommendations on this subject?

Mr. SAYERS. The committee would probably resent the giving of such advice by anyone. The gentleman from Illinois should beware. [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; they would not resent it when it is called for, and I ask the gentleman for his suggestion.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Tennessee has long been a member of the Joint Committee on Printing, and the House is well aware of his ability and recognizes him as a practical man of great industry, and I have also before me the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS], who is the chairman of that committee, whose life has been largely spent in publishing and kindred pursuits, and in whose intelligence and industry we all have full confidence, and with these gentlemen I am satisfied that the investigation will be in proper and safe hands, and am willing there to leave it.

Mr. STEELE. Before the gentleman from Illinois takes his seat I hope he will give us the name of the prophet that called the "dry bones" together. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Well, I will have that part of my remarks edited by my eminent theological friend from Indiana. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. PICKLER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois with reference to the small item for deputy surveyors in the bill—did that remain in with the conference committee?

Mr. CANNON. I think it remained in the bill.

I now ask a vote on the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. The Committee on Pensions recommend an amendment striking out "fifty" and inserting in lieu thereof "twenty."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PICKLER. Has this bill been reported by the Committee on Pensions?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Yes; unanimously reported by the committee.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, the amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 20, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. CALL, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

THE FINANCIAL CONDITION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 10th instant, certain information as to the amount of coin and currency and forms of notes and money of the United States in existence on January 1, 1896, and the amount held as reserves by national and State banks, private banks and bankers, loan and trust companies, and other financial institutions and concerns, etc., together with statements showing the amount of paper and coin in existence in the United States, and the amount outside of the Treasury from 1800 to 1894, both inclusive; which, with the accompanying statements, was, on motion of Mr. PEFFER, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of the legislature of the State of Utah, praying that a portion of Arizona lying north of the Colorado River be annexed to the State of Utah; which was, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF UTAH, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Salt Lake City, February 15, 1896.

To the President of the Senate:

I have the honor to transmit herewith, to be laid before the Senate, a certified copy of the memorial of the legislature of the State of Utah, praying that a portion of Arizona lying north of the Colorado River be annexed to the State of Utah. I am, sir,

Very respectfully,

JAMES T. HAMMOND,
Secretary of State.

Joint memorial to the Congress of the United States.

Your memorialists, the governor and the legislature of the State of Utah would respectfully represent to your honorable body that those portions of Coconino and Mohave counties, of Arizona Territory, lying north of the Colorado River should properly belong to Utah for these reasons:

First. The Colorado River forms an impassable barrier between said portions of Coconino and Mohave counties and the main bodies of said counties and Arizona.

Second. The residents of said portions of Arizona herewith attach a petition asking for said annexation to Utah, because all their interests are in common with the people of Utah, being cut off from communication with the citizens and courts of Arizona, except by a far circuitous route through a wild and rough country occupied by the Navajo and Apache Indians; that they live within 4 miles of Utah and desire her protection, as they receive inadequate protection from Arizona.

Third. That the taxpayers of said lands who are residents of Utah also herewith attach a petition asking for said annexation for the reason that said lands are sparsely settled and are unprofitable for irrigation and suitable only for grazing purposes. That the herds and flocks thereon are owned in Utah; that, owing to the wildness of said lands, it has become a place of refuge for desperate and lawless men; that Arizona affords the stock owners no protection, and that the defense of their property and prosecution of said lawless citizens has devolved upon Utah, to the detriment of those counties adjoining said Territory, and that they should have the benefit arising from the funds derived from taxation. We therefore earnestly ask that those portions of Coconino and Mohave counties north of the Colorado River be attached to and made a part of the State of Utah, and that the Colorado River be the dividing line.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

Approved February 12, 1896.

HEBER M. WELLS,
Governor of Utah.
GEORGE M. CANNON,
President of the Senate.
PRESLEY DENNY,
Speaker of the House.

To the President and Congress of the United States:

We, the undersigned, residents and landholders of that portion of Coconino County, Ariz., lying north of the Colorado River, ask you to annex said portions of Coconino County to the State of Utah, for various and divers reasons set forth in the memorial passed by the legislature of Utah, and as may be presented to you by the honorable Representative of Utah; and, as in duty bound, your petitioners will ever pray.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 29, 1896.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of January 25, inclosing bill S. 1770, providing for the appointment of pharmacists in the United States Marine-Hospital Service, etc., and requesting that I furnish the committee with such suggestions as may seem proper touching the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage.

In reply I transmit herewith a copy of the Regulations of the Marine-Hospital Service, on page 17 of which (paragraphs 50 to 61, inclusive) will be found the regulations concerning appointment, qualifications, compensation, allowances, grades, promotions, discipline, and general duties of hospital stewards.

From these paragraphs it will be seen that hospital stewards are required to pass an examination as to their general and special qualifications, and that their compensation is fixed by this Department. At present this compensation is as follows: For hospital stewards of the first class, $40 per month, with quarters, subsistence, fuel, light and water, and laundering; after the expiration of one year they are promoted to the grade of second-class stewards, with pay of $50 per month, with the same allowances, and after one more year's service they are promoted to the grade of third-class stewards, at $60 per month, with the same allowances. When serving at stations where no quarters are provided, $25 per month as commutation of quarters is allowed, and when traveling under orders they are allowed usual traveling expenses and transportation of 500 pounds of baggage.

Section 1 of the said bill provides that the hospital stewards shall be called "pharmacists," and shall be warrant officers of the United States Marine-Hospital Service.

With regard to the term "pharmacist," I have to state that the duties of hospital stewards in the Marine-Hospital Service cover a much wider field than is designated by this term. It is true that hospital stewards must be graduates of pharmacy, but the time consumed in actual pharmaceutical labor is limited and would not warrant their employment for this duty alone.

Hospital stewards in the Marine-Hospital Service, besides filling prescriptions, are obliged to have charge of property, records, and correspondence, purchase and issue of supplies, and general oversight of the attendants. The United States marine hospitals are not provided with matrons, nor with hospital clerks. When the work is too great for one steward, two are assigned to a station. If these employees of the Treasury Department are by law designated as "pharmacists" the value of their services in other respects would be impaired.

Moreover, if hospital stewards are appointed by law to be "permanently attached to the Marine-Hospital Service," "to continue during good behavior of the appointee," it will deprive the Department of discontinuing their services should necessity require a reduction in the number employed.

The same section provides that the hospital stewards or pharmacists shall be known as "warrant officers" of the United States Marine-Hospital Service. I have to state that no such officers are known in the Treasury Department. It is not clear exactly what is meant by the term "warrant officer" in this bill.

Section 2 provides for the pay of said pharmacists. This section is objected to because it gives a newly appointed steward the same compensation as one who has served any number of years less than five, and does not provide for promotion as a result of satisfactory service, as is now provided by the regulations of the Marine-Hospital Service. The matter of compensation of hospital stewards should be left to the Department, subject to such modification as may be necessary by reason of the condition of the fund from which they are paid.

There is nothing provided in this section which can not be as well provided, and more properly, by regulation.

Section 3 provides for the examination before a board of officers of the Marine-Hospital Service. This provision is practically in force at present under regulations; but as these examinations must be held frequently, at remote points, where only one marine-hospital officer is stationed, to require a board to be summoned as provided by this section for said examination would entail additional and unnecessary expense.

Sections 4 and 5 are simply confirmatory of previous provisions of the bill, with the addition of provisions relating to order and precedence in the list and to allowances, both of which are now fixed by regulation.

For the above reasons I am convinced that it would be detrimental to the interests of the Marine-Hospital Service for this bill to become a law.

Respectfully, yours,

C. S. HAMLIN, Acting Secretary.

IMMIGRATION INVESTIGATING COMMISSION.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution providing for printing the report of the Immigration Investigating Commission appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, to report it with an amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment of the Committee on Printing was, in line 2, before the word "copies," to strike out "bound," and after the word "copies" to insert "in paper cover"; so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That there be printed 3,500 copies in paper cover of the report of the Immigration Investigrting Commission, appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury under date of June 13, 1894, 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate and 1,500 copies for the use of the Bureau of Immigration, Treasury Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

SPEECH ENVELOPES.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report a resolution which I ask may be considered at the present time.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to deliver to the Public Printer such speech envelopes as were in his possession upon the taking effect of the act governing the public printing and binding, etc., approved January 12, 1895; the Public Printer to receipt to the said Sergeant-at-Arms for the said envelopes.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the necessity for that?

Mr. HALE. I do not know that there is any. It is thought that possibly it might require a resolution. It certainly does no harm.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the accompanying letter from the Public Printer be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

MANITOWOC HARBOR IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. NELSON. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 121) calling upon the Secretary of War for certain information in relation to the harbor at Manitowoc, to report it favorably, without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution was read at length when under consideration yesterday.

Mr. HILL. This resolution presents the same question that was before the Senate yesterday as to the necessity of a joint resolution to procure estimates from the Department. I understand that that is the object of the joint resolution. Of course, if the joint resolution passes it must necessarily go to the President. The Senate may be of opinion, and conclusive opinion, that we are required to have a joint resolution. Ought not the question to be passed upon by some committee? Ought not the Committee on the Judiciary, or some other committee, make a report upon that question, that we may know precisely where we stand and whether we have not the power under the existing status of affairs to ask substantially for information (for that is about what it amounts to) without the consent of the President of the United States? If Senators prefer to introduce joint resolutions from time to time and have the action of the President upon them, that, of course, is their privilege. It strikes me, however, that it is an unnecessary burden cast upon the Senate.

Yesterday the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, who now is present, expressed his view, hastily, it is true, that a joint resolution is necessary, and hence the President must approve of this resolution. I now call the attention of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, to the subject, and ask whether he is inclined still to adhere to that opinion. The point I make is, that it seems to me, before we go much further with this class of resolutions, we ought to have some opinion from some committee that has given the matter attention, in order that we may know how to proceed in the future, or else if we pass a mere concurrent resolution objection may be raised by the Department or by some one else in regard to it.

I merely make this suggestion, not in hostility to this particular resolution, but out of regard to the whole subject. Has it come to this, that we are obliged to have a joint resolution of Congress approved by the President for the purpose of eliciting this class of information when the act of Congress simply provides that the information may be procured by resolution of Congress? It strikes me that it is an important matter, that in some way ought to be determined.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from New York, I beg leave to state that by the last section of the river and harbor act of 1894, the following provision was made and enacted into a law by Congress, and it is the provision under which this resolution has been introduced:

Provided further, That after the regular or formal report on any examination, survey, project, or work under way or proposed is submitted, no supplemental or additional report or estimate, for the same fiscal year, shall be made unless ordered by a resolution of Congress.

That clearly implies both Houses of Congress. The last clause of section 7 of Article I of the Constitution contains the following provision:

Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States, and before the same shall take effect shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

The last Congress having enacted a law prescribing that such reports can only be called for by a resolution of Congress, which means both Houses, I think it is perfectly clear that under this provision of the Constitution, in view of the law of 1894, such resolutions have to be approved by the President.

Mr. HOAR. I made a statement yesterday in substance the same as that just made by the Senator from Minnesota, but I am bound to say that on reflecting on the matter more carefully I have come to the opinion that I was mistaken and that the clause in the Constitution which provides that where the assent of both Houses of Congress is necessary to a measure it must be laid before the President means constitutionally necessary, and that it would not prevent making an arrangement that anything which without a law could be done by one House or perhaps even by one Senator, as a direction for information, might be done by both Houses. The practice in regard to printing—if I am mistaken the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is chairman of that committee, will correct me—has been in that way for a great many years, that where a matter of printing is to cost less than $500 either House may order it of itself, but where it is to cost more than $500 it requires a concurrent resolution. I understand that those resolutions are never sent to the President, and the Senator from Maine affirms this statement, although under the law the assent of both Houses is necessary. So I am satisfied that I was incorrect in what I said yesterday in regard to the matter.

Mr. HILL. Permit me to make a suggestion to the Senator from Minnesota. Is there any special hurry about this resolution? If there is not, I was going to suggest a reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator from New York that there is a necessity for prompt action. Parties have been here from Manitowoc, Wis., and they are very anxious to have the harbor deepened there by reason of the fact that two lines of railroads have been built into that place within recent years, and during the winter those roads have to ship their freight on large boats across the river to Michigan, as the outlet by the upper lakes is frozen. In view of these facts it is important to get this report and estimate so that it may be acted upon by the River and Harbor Committee of the House.

I trust the Senator from New York will let this resolution go through this morning. There are a number of other resolutions pending before the committee, where the Senator can have this question investigated further if he desires.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from New York will accede to the request of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HILL. Under the circumstances I shall not ask that the resolution go to the Judiciary Committee, although I shall take an opportunity in the near future, either when some such resolution is presented again or in some other shape, to get some authoritative decision on this subject by the Senate.

Mr. FRYE. Why does not the Senator introduce an order asking the opinion of the Judiciary Committee on this subject? There are three or four more of these resolutions, and they are all of them joint, and the reason they are joint is because the War Department has construed the law as requiring that they shall be so.

Mr. HILL. I think I will accept the suggestion of the Senator from Maine and do so.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. VILAS. I will take no further time now, the objection having been withdrawn.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SACRAMENTO RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. WHITE. From the Committee on Commerce I report a substitute for Senate resolution No. 134, and I ask its immediate consideration. It has a favorable report from the Committee on Commerce.

The joint resolution (S. R. 82) directing the Secretary of War to inquire as to the present condition of the Sacramento River, California, and to estimate the cost of such improvements as may be necessary, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, directed to inquire as to the present condition of the Sacramento River in California and the effect upon navigation of the recent floods therein; and to estimate the cost of such improvements as may be necessary to restore said river to its natural channel; and to report generally as to the nature and extent of such work as in his opinion the circumstances of the case require.

Mr. WHITE. I will state that by reason of recent floods, occurring last month, the Sacramento River has practically left its channel, to the destruction of navigation; and the object of this joint resolution is to relieve the Department from the inhibition of section 13 of the last river and harbor act.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHITE. I also report back from the Committee on Commerce resolution No. 134, with a recommendation of indefinite postponement, the matter being covered by the joint resolution which has just been passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be indefinitely postponed.

MERCHANT MARINE ENGINEER SERVICE.

Mr. SQUIRE. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1242) to amend section 4131 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to improve the merchant marine engineer service, and thereby also to increase the efficiency of the Naval Reserve. to report it favorably with amendments.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE] has just reported a bill providing that certain engineers, officers on steamships, shall be American citizens. He introduced the bill some time since, and on its introduction censured very severely indeed the American International Navigation Company for its attitude toward this question of American citizenship, making charges which could not be sustained by facts; not that he himself would deal unjustly with anybody—I know that he would not—but he was simply crammed with misinformation. I can not allow that to pass without notice, because the International Line is, to a large extent, a child of my own, and I am proud of it.

In the course of his remarks the Senator from Washington cited the fact that the St. Paul, with her foreign engineers, had run aground and that several of them had been killed. As a matter of fact two of the engineers who were killed were native-born American citizens and the other one had filed his intention to become a naturalized citizen. I assert without fear of contradiction that there is not a line of steamships in the United States which has done so much to promote American citizenship as this same International Line. They are educating to-day under the law—and no other company is doing it—46 American-born boys as cadets, who are to be thoroughly educated to fill the petty offices and up to that of commander of the ship, taking, I think, from four to six years' time.

Furthermore, it was stated by the Senator that the engine rooms were officered almost entirely by foreigners. The St. Louis has 24 men in the engine room, 21 of whom are citizens, 13 of them native born, and 3 have declared their intention to become citizens. The St. Paul has 27 men in the engine room, 22 of them citizens, 9 of them native born, and 5 have declared their intention to become citizens. The Paris has 24 men in the engine room; 18 are citizens, 3 native born, and 4 have declared their intentions to become citizens. The New York has 25 men in the engine room, 14 of whom are citizens, and 11 have declared their intention to become citizens. In other words, out of a total of 100 men engaged in the engine rooms of these four ships 75 are citizens, 27 native born, 23 have declared their intention and will in due course of time become citizens, and only 2 of the entire force are aliens who have not declared their intention.

The act of March 3, 1891, provided that vessels employed in the mail service should be officered by American citizens in conformity with existing law. Under the advice of the Attorney-General it was held that engineers were not officers. Complaint was made by the American engineers that this was a wrong construction of the law, and the bill reported to-day is intended to correct the law and require American citizenship, and it is reported unanimously from the committee.

I am in favor of American citizenship for the officers of our ships just as earnestly as the Senator from Washington, but when the New York and Paris came under the American flag they had in their engine rooms men who had been brought up with that machinery, who understood it thoroughly and completely; and with the number of lives that might be put in peril on board those great ships, and with the enormous amount of property, they could not at once change every one of those officers, and they ought not to have done it, but so fast as they could they have made the changes.

Now, consider another thing. The law required that within a certain time 25 per cent of the crew of these vessels should be American citizens. They have gone away beyond that requirement of the law. The St. Louis, with an average crew of 382, has 164 of them American citizens. You can not find the same proportion on another vessel in the United States, in my judgment—sailing ship or steamship. The St. Paul, with an average crew of 309, has 162 citizens. The New York, with an average of 413, has 156 citizens. The Paris, with an average crew of 382, has 159 citizens. Many of the aliens in all the departments of the steamers have declared their intention, taken out their first papers, and are only awaiting the time required by the law before taking final papers and becoming citizens.

Under the law and regulations the deck officers below the grade of second mate are not required to be citizens, but on this American line, which has been so seriously criticised as employing foreigners, every officer in each ship is a citizen of the United States, and the foreign element is made up largely of waiters and stewards, and you can not always get Americans to act in those places. That is the reason they are foreigners.

Nor is this disposition to favor and promote citizenship confined to the four ships which have been Americanized or which are floating the American flag. The International Navigation Company has 22 steamships. Of those, 9 sail under the American flag, 4 under the British flag, and 9 under the Belgian flag. One of the British ships is a spare, not now in commission. Of the 21 ships in commission, 19 are commanded by American citizens and only 2 by aliens, notwithstanding the ships themselves are alien and under foreign flags. There are employed upon those 21 steamers 85 officers, 65 of whom are citizens and only 20 aliens. Out of a total of 106 commanders and officers, 84, or 79¼ per cent, are citizens of the United States, and those, remember, are engaged on Belgian and British ships as well as on American steamers.

Mr. President, I believed it to be my duty, in justice to this line, to say what I have and to indicate to the Senate how marvelously well this line, which has been so seriously attacked, is performing its duty touching American citizenship, and is more than meeting all the requirements of law.

Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President, I think it is perhaps due to this question and to myself that I make a few remarks, although I may say that this subject has been unexpectedly sprung upon me this morning. I had no supposition that the honorable Senator from Maine was about to bring up the question or to refer to what I said when I introduced Senate bill No. 1172, which was afterwards superseded by the introduction of the bill which was reported favorably this morning and which I also introduced.

In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I ask that I may be allowed to read from the RECORD a few sentences, quoting the remarks which I made on the occasion of the introduction of the bill. I then said:

> Mr. President, still another most important feature of the bill is to increase the efficiency of our Naval Reserve. When, a few years ago, a bill was passed granting, under certain conditions, a subsidy to American steamers for carrying the mails to foreign countries, there was a stipulation in that bill that these ships should be "officered by American citizens." When this bill was passed I am sure that it was the belief of every Senator that this meant that, in all parts of the ship upon which her movements and her navigation depended, the responsible men in charge—call them what you will—should be American citizens.
> When the steamers of the American Line were accorded the privilege of carrying the American flag, and thus taking advantage of the provisions of the postal subsidy act, the managers of this great line of steamers openly and successfully contended that the provisions regarding citizenship did not apply to the engineers, because, forsooth, in the eyes of the people who control this great line, an engineer was not an "officer"; and so it goes to-day. The ships which we are annually paying a large subsidy for carrying the mails, under the supposition that they are officered by American citizens, actually have only a few real American citizens on board (of course in the engine room to which this bill refers). The rest are foreigners upon whom we could not count in an emergency; men who have no interest in the ships save that which comes from their employment in time of peace. And thus is lost to us the very thing for which we are paying a subsidy—the building up of an American merchant marine and the officering and manning of the ships by truly American citizens——

Mr. FRYE. Now the Senator sees how dreadfully mistaken he was in that statement.

Mr. SQUIRE. If the Senator will pardon me, I will finish the sentence—

> so that in the event of the services of these steamers being required by the Government in case of war with a foreign Government, they would be in a condition to at once be pressed into service. As it is now—

This is the language which I understand the Senator from Maine to criticise:

> The ships of the American Line are officered in their engine rooms almost entirely by foreigners, and this fact was apparent a few days ago, when the papers gave an account of a sad catastrophe on board the American liner St. Paul, where most of the engineers are not citizens of this country.

This is every word I said about the St. Paul; referring, of course, to the published list of names and residences as I thought I had a right to do.

The Senator says that he acquits me of any intention to misrepresent in this matter. I thank him for his courtesy in that regard; but he also states that he thinks that I have been misinformed, and that certain pretended facts had been presented to me which were in reality not at all in accordance with the truth. I was governed in making that statement by the reports in the public prints that these engineers were not citizens of the United States, and by statements of men in whom I had a right to place confidence—officers of the American merchant-marine service—highly respectable and responsible men, and in their statements they were backed up by officers of the United States Navy who were familiar with the facts in the case, as was represented to me, and I still have a right to believe they were correct in the main points originally at issue; although it is doubtless true that the conditions have since partly changed, probably in large measure due to the agitation created by the discussion upon this subject. I give the honorable Senator from Maine credit for his loyalty to the great line whose American registry for two ships was secured through his efficient cooperation. At present I am unable to criticise the figures which he submits, as it will take days to verify the records and even their authenticity. I am informed there are men serving on these ships who claim to be Americans who will be unable to prove their citizenship.

Now, let me say in regard to this matter that, as I understand, when these steamships of this great company called the American liners were built there were employed at the time of their construction in England engineers not belonging to this country, who were present from the laying of the keel to the putting in of every element affecting the mechanical construction, and that those engineers were, perhaps, mainly of Scottish nationality.

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator from Washington permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SQUIRE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHITE. Do I understand the Senator from Washington to state that officers of the Navy of the United States had given him information in conflict with the statement of the Senator from Maine in reference to the matter?

Mr. SQUIRE. That is what I stated.

Mr. FRYE. That officers of the Navy had given the Senator information?

Mr. SQUIRE. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRYE. Of course no information can be given which controverts the statement I have made, because it is taken from the records and can be confirmed in the Treasury Department here at Washington.

Mr. SQUIRE. If the Senator will allow me, I do not think we differ so greatly about this matter. As a member of the Committee on Commerce, I have concurred in the amendments to the bill, which was carefully studied and prepared by the chairman of the committee and the other members. I am well aware of the fact that there was some feeling originally generated on both sides; first, among the American engineers from their sense of the injustice perpetrated; and, second, among those who were criticised for what was thought to be an evasion of the law; but it has all been allayed and placated, and it does not seem to me that it was best at this stage of the matter to bring up anything that might seem acrimonious, and therefore——

Mr. PLATT. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to inquire what is the matter before the Senate?

Mr. SQUIRE. If the Senator from Connecticut will permit me, I will say I reported a bill from the Committee on Commerce——

Mr. PLATT. In there any question before the Senate?

Mr. SQUIRE. I reported from the Committee on Commerce a bill, with amendments, as authorized by the committee, and the chairman of the committee saw fit to make some statements, in which he called in question statements that I had previously made on the floor of the Senate, and I was endeavoring to briefly explain the situation as I understand it. I shall not occupy the Senate for five minutes.

Mr. PLATT. Suppose that we have unanimous consent that the Senator from Washington is exonerated from any blame or criticism.

Mr. SQUIRE. I prefer, if the Senator will permit me, to complete the explanation.

I wish to state, following up what I remarked at the beginning, that there is no doubt of the fact that the engineers originally employed upon this line were of foreign nationality. I do not think that is disputed. The statement has been made that it was needful that men of such nationality should be employed, that it was impossible to secure the requisite number of competent engineers for those vessels from American sources, of American nationality, and that therefore this company did employ engineers of foreign nationality. There has been no dispute about that; but the provisions of the law were very plain that the officers shall be Americans. To get around that law, a construction of it was obtained, as I understand, from one of the branches of the then existing Administration, namely, the Department of Justice, that the engineers, forsooth, were not officers.

That seems to me to have been a very remarkable and strained construction of the law. In view of the fact that this great company is receiving a large subsidy—I voted for it, and am very glad it is receiving the subsidy, and I do not now object to it—I maintain that it should conform to the spirit of the law as was intended, and that if there is any doubt of the letter of the law that should be corrected as proposed in the bill as reported. I also say that it is right and proper that these engineers of the United States commercial marine should be recognized, and that their rights should be respected as well as the rights and interests of this great corporation. I believe that American engineers are fully competent for the duties to be performed and that some are showing their competence on this very line.

Furthermore, I wish to explain that, while it is probably true that most, if not all, of these engineers were originally of foreign nationality, many of them did declare their intention to become citizens, and I do not doubt some of them did so in sincerity and with the fullest intention to become citizens of the United States; yet it is not yet proved that they have all become citizens of the United States by any means. There are some of them who have declared their intentions; probably some of them have become citizens; I do not doubt that the number is increasing from day to day and from month to month of those who become citizens; but what the representatives of the engineers of the United States desire, what their friends desire, is that all these men shall in good faith become American citizens if they are to pursue their vocation as engineers of this line of steamships, which is supported by subsidy of the United States Government on the distinct condition that those engineers shall be Americans, that is, that the officers shall be Americans, and we believe that according to any sensible construction engineers are officers, and they are entitled to the rank and the consideration which officers receive, because they have so much to do with the management and the running of these great craft, with their vast and complicated machinery, holding the interests of life and property in their charge.

Again, I may add that I do not wish to assail the patriotism of the officials of the American Line. I rejoice with other Americans that these great ships carry the American flag. If none but Americans are on guard in the engine rooms of these vessels then no injury can befall the company by the passage of this act.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. SQUIRE. I am also directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1172) to amend section 4131 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to improve the merchant-marine engineer service, and thereby also to increase the efficiency of the Naval Reserve, to report it adversely, and to ask that the bill be postponed indefinitely, for the reason that the bill just reported by me covers the same subject-matter and is substantially the same with a few important additions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be indefinitely postponed.

JOSEPHINE FOOTE FAIRFAX.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, in accordance with the unanimous consent yesterday, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the bill, which was then under consideration in the morning hour, regulating marriages in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator permit me to bring up a small matter pertaining to morning business?

Mr. FAULKNER. Yes.

Mr. HAWLEY. I call attention to the bill (S. 1784) granting an increase of pension to Josephine Foote Fairfax, which was passed yesterday. I do it for the purpose of asking unanimous consent for a reconsideration, in order that an annoying verbal error may be corrected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut? The Chair hears none; and the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed will be reconsidered, in the absence of objection. The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate.

Mr. HAWLEY. In line 7, after the words "United States," I move to strike out the word "Army" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "Navy."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask unanimous consent to take up House bill 1785. I will state to the Senate that it will require probably not more than half a minute to dispose of it. It simply asks for a donation of a little condemned cannon and some cannon balls at St. Paul to a Grand Army post in Kansas, and they are anxious, if they can secure them, to have them before Memorial Day. The bill is reported favorably, and I am sure there will be no objection to it.

Mr. FAULKNER. I shall not object to the bill if there is no discussion upon it.

Mr. PEFFER. I am sure there will not be. If there is, I will withdraw it.

Mr. CULLOM. There is a bill, and this may be the one possibly, where two or three different localities have united in asking for the same thing.

Mr. PEFFER. No; this is a separate bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1785) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to donate one condemned cannon and four pyramids of condemned cannon balls to W. H. Wallace Post, No. 66, Grand Army of the Republic, of Eldorado, Kans., and for other purposes.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4960) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 5359) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

REGULATION OF MARRIAGES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the bill relating to the regulation of marriages in the District of Columbia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill indicated by the Senator from West Virginia, which will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1904) to regulate marriages in the District of Columbia.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. HILL. Let the amendment be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, line 3, before the word "person," it is proposed to insert the word "male"; and after the word "age," in line 4, to insert the words "and, if a female, under 18 years of age"; so as to read:

That if any male person intending to marry in the District of Columbia be under 21 years of age, and, if a female, under 18 years of age, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has some amendments which he desires to offer to the bill. I should like to have them acted upon now, because, if they are adopted, it will necessitate some changes in the bill which I have prepared.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend section 2 by striking out the word "That," at the beginning thereof, and inserting:

That marriages in the District of Columbia may be celebrated by the judge of any court of record or any justice of the peace.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest that the Senator use the word "solemnized."

Mr. HOAR. I use the word "celebrated" and not "solemnized" because it is a civil and not an ecclesiastical or religious ceremony.

"That marriages in the District of Columbia may be celebrated before the judge of any court of record or any justice of the peace." Then capitalize the "w" in the word "when," in line 2. After the word "dollars," in line 7, I move to insert "to comply with the conditions of this act"; and after the words "District of Columbia," in line 9, I move to insert as a part of the second section what is now the third section, merely striking out the word "That" at the beginning thereof. I move to strike out the remainder of section 2, and with respect to that I shall make a motion as soon as this amendment is disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 2 strike out the first word "That" and insert:

That marriages in the District of Columbia may be celebrated by the judge of any court of record or any justice of the peace.

After the word "dollars," in line 7, insert "to comply with the conditions of this act," and after the word "Columbia," in line 9, strike out the remainder of the section and insert:

Marriages between persons belonging to any religious society which has no ordained minister may be solemnized by the person appointed and in the manner prescribed by and practiced in any such society.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That marriages in the District of Columbia may be celebrated by the judge of any court of record or any justice of the peace. When any minister or other person, appointed or ordained according to the rites and ceremonies of his church, shall, before the supreme court of the District of Columbia, produce proof that he is duly appointed or ordained as such, and that he is in regular communion with the religious society of which he is a member, and give bond in the penalty of $500 to comply with the provisions of this act, such court may make an order authorizing him to celebrate the rites of marriage in the District of Columbia. Marriages between persons belonging to any religious society which has no ordained minister may be solemnized by the person appointed and in the manner prescribed by and practiced in any such society.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Then I move to insert what I send to the desk as section 3, which, with a few changes, is the language of the rest of the second section, just stricken out.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as section 3:

SEC. 3. That no one but a minister or other person authorized by this act shall hereafter celebrate the rites of marriage in this District, anything in any law now in force in said District to the contrary notwithstanding.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER. In line 1 of section 6 it is necessary to make an amendment because of the one just adopted. I send the amendment to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 6 by inserting, after the word "person," in line 1, the words "who has executed bond under section 2 of this act, and is"; so as to make the section read:

That if any minister or other person who has executed bond under section 2 of this act and is authorized to celebrate marriages in this District shall fail to comply with the provisions of section 8 of this act, the condition of such bond shall be deemed to be thereby broken.

Mr. HOAR. Is that amendment necessary after the amendment just adopted, which provides that the bond shall be to comply with the provisions of the proposed act?

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator will read that section he will find that it provides when the condition of the bond shall be deemed to have been broken. I intend to follow that with an additional clause to be attached to that section. I will suggest the amendment to the Senator, and I shall offer it immediately after the adoption of the pending amendment. It is to this effect, that if a judge of a court of record or a justice of the peace shall fail to comply with the provisions of section 8 of the proposed act, he shall upon conviction be fined, in the discretion of the court, not exceeding $500.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator from West Virginia will not press the amendment. I think putting a penalty on a judge of a court of record if he does not do according to the law is a novel proceeding. It is not quite consistent with the dignity of a judge of the supreme court of the District of Columbia. If he does not comply with every condition in marriage, the penalty is impeachment, disgrace.

Mr. FAULKNER. No. The penalty would apply to his failure to comply with that provision of the eighth section which forbids him from marrying persons unless under a license. If any officer authorized to celebrate the rites of matrimony in this District feels disposed to run the risk of marrying parties without a license, when the whole of the proposed statute contemplates devolving upon the clerk of the court the entire inquiry as to the propriety and legality of a marriage before issuing the license, I think he ought to be subject to a fine. Certainly we could not allow magistrates in the District, justices of the peace, to have this power without imposing a penalty when we impose such a penalty on ministers and on all others who are invested and clothed with this authority.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER. I offer an amendment to come in after the word "broken," in line 4 of section 6.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 6 it is proposed to insert:

And if a justice of the peace shall fail to comply with the provisions of section 8 of this act, he shall, upon conviction, be fined, in the discretion of the court, not exceeding $500.

Mr. PLATT. Is there a penal clause with reference to any other person—clergymen, for instance? As I understand the bill, clergymen are to give a bond and are liable upon their bond, but there is no penalty attached; they are not to be prosecuted in the courts. This seems to make a difference in that respect. Perhaps I have not understood the bill correctly.

Mr. FAULKNER. It does make a difference, because the clergymen are required to give a bond of $500, and the breaking of the condition of the bond is marrying persons without a license. The penalty is exactly the same as that imposed upon a magistrate if he violates the same provision.

Mr. PLATT. The magistrate does not have to give a bond.

Mr. FAULKNER. No, he does not have to give a bond. He is simply clothed with this power, but the penalty is fixed at the same amount if either one of them shall marry persons without a license.

Mr. PLATT. To whom does the clergyman give bond?

Mr. FAULKNER. To the United States; and the condition of the bond is that he will not marry persons without a license.

Mr. PLATT. Does the Senator suppose that if a clergyman should marry persons contrary to the provisions of section 8 and suit were brought against him upon his bond, there would necessarily be recovered the whole amount of the bond?

Mr. FAULKNER. I think so, under the sixth section.

Mr. PLATT. I have always understood that in cases of suit on penal bonds given to the Government judgment against the person whose bond is defaulted is not necessarily rendered for the full amount of the bond.

Mr. FAULKNER. The authorities could not ascertain the amount in any other way than that fixed in the bond, which is the penalty for a breach thereof.

Mr. PLATT. I venture to suggest that if there is a violation of the bond there never will be a judgment obtained against the person who violates the condition of the bond.

Mr. FAULKNER. I hope not. I hope there will be no occasion for it. I do not believe there will ever be occasion for it even in the case of a magistrate. I do not believe that any magistrate will marry persons without the authority of a license, and if he has the license he has no other responsibility under the proposed law.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from West Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER. In section 8, line 6, after the word "minister," I move to insert "or other person authorized to celebrate the rites of marriage."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from West Virginia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "minister," in section 8, line 6, it is proposed to insert:

Or other person authorized to celebrate the rites of marriage.

So as to read:

And certificates of the officiating minister or other person authorized to celebrate the rites of marriage shall be numbered correspondingly and consecutively from 1 upward.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER. In section 9, line 3, I move to strike out the word "ministers'."

The SECRETARY. In section 9, line 3, before the word "certificates," it is proposed to strike out "ministers'"; so as to read:

That the clerk shall provide a record book of his office, in which shall be filed in the order of their number the certificates upon their return to said office.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER. In section 7, line 2, I move to strike out the word "condition"; so as to read:

That it shall be the duty of the clerk to examine and ascertain the full names, ages, color, whether married previously or single, whether related or not, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER. In the same section, line 8, I move to strike out the word "condition."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER. I offer the amendment that I send to the desk, to be numbered section 10.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section, to be numbered section 10, as follows:

SEC. 10. That if the clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia shall neglect or refuse to comply with the provisions of this act, he shall, upon conviction, be fined not less than $25 nor more than $500, in the discretion of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], whom I see now in his seat, has some doubt as to the proper construction of section 4. As the views of the Senator from Mississippi and those of the committee are in full accord, I send to the desk a substitute for section 4. I move to strike out section 4 and insert what I send to the desk. It will be satisfactory to the Senator from Mississippi.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 4 and insert:

SEC. 4. No marriage heretofore or hereafter solemnized shall be deemed or adjudged to be invalid, nor shall the validity thereof be in any way affected, on account of any want of authority in any person solemnizing the same if consummated with a full belief on the part of the persons so married, or either of them, that they were lawfully joined in marriage.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PEFFER. I wish to inquire of the Senator who has charge of the bill whether there is anything in any of the original provisions of the bill or in the amendments which would make unlawful a marriage solemnized in any other way than by the methods provided in the bill?

Mr. FAULKNER. No; under the decisions of the courts I am satisfied that although the requirements of these sections should not be complied with it would not invalidate a marriage, because there is no provision in the proposed act or any section of it which invalidates a marriage by reason of the failure to comply with any one of the provisions. The Supreme Court has passed upon that question very fully, and has held that if there is no such provision in an act, although the requirements of the act are not complied with, it does not invalidate the marriage.

Mr. PEFFER. I know that among certain classes of our people, especially among the Society of Friends, commonly called Quakers, they have a method of solemnizing marriages among themselves without any special ceremony. I think that is provided for by one of the provisions in the bill.

Mr. FAULKNER. Yes; that is fully provided for.

Mr. PEFFER. It frequently happens that persons ignorant of the law contract marriages, or at least think they do. Such cases are probably covered by the amendment suggested by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr GEORGE]. With the further explanation of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER], I am satisfied.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to move to amend by proposing a section to follow section 4, as follows:

SEC. —. No marriage shall hereafter be solemnized in this District to which any citizen of a foreign country shall be a party until a minister or consul representing such foreign country in the United States shall certify that the conditions to the validity of the marriage of the laws of such country have been complied with.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts, if he will permit me, that if he will examine the amendment submitted by me yesterday he will find that what he proposes is not necessary. I have examined into the question to which the Senator refers, and——

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from West Virginia had better hear me in favor of the amendment before he objects to it.

Mr. FAULKNER. I did not suppose the Senator had seen the amendment already proposed to the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I have. I have seen it with special reference to this point. That amendment simply adds to section 7 of the bill a requirement that the clerk shall ascertain whether all the requirements of the laws relating to marriage in the country of which he or she is a citizen have been complied with. But it does not provide at all that anything shall happen if the clerk finds the fact to be one way or the other which would not happen in the reverse case. The Senator by his amendment merely imposes upon the clerk the duty of ascertaining whether the requirements of the foreign law have been complied with.

I propose to go further and to provide, not as affecting the validity of the marriage, if it has been actually performed and consummated, leaving that to the forepart of the section, that the magistrate or minister shall not go on with the marriage without the certificate of the consul. I should like to have read, for I think the reason may be stated more compactly in that way, a communication made to me by Mr. Wilson, formerly consul at Nice, stating some very curious facts that have come to his knowledge.

We want to protect American girls who are attractive by reason of their beauty or accomplishments or the possession of a fortune from the rapacity of adventurers, whether titled or untitled, belonging to foreign countries. As the law exists at present, for instance, no person in a foreign army can contract a lawful marriage with an American girl without the assent of his own government. In France and in some other countries no person under 25 years of age can contract a lawful marriage without the assent of his parents. No person over 25 years of age can contract such a lawful marriage without notice to his parents, if they be living, to give them an opportunity to file objections, though their consent is not necessary.

So a person of that character can come here and contract a marriage with an American woman, take her home, and although he may have dwelt here with her as her husband for ten years, she can be turned out and the marriage is absolutely null and void there. It is carried so far that in one case, which is stated in the document that I have just sent to the desk, a German lived here with a lawful American wife for eight or ten years, had several children, then went home and lived with her in Germany as his wife for a little while. Then he married another woman, his American wife being living. The American marriage was held void.

Then he died, and there was a contest between the American wife and the German wife in your State, Mr. President, the State of Illinois, as to which was entitled to administer upon and succeed to the estate as wife. The Illinois court was compelled to hold that the question of the lawfulness of the marriage was settled by the law of the place where they had been living together, and in Germany the American marriage was held void. So our court, though the marriage was perfectly valid according to our law, was constrained to follow the decision of the German court.

I should like to have the statement, which is very brief, read.

Mr. FAULKNER. Before that is read——

Mr. HOAR. Let it be read. I want to have the two things go together.

Mr. FAULKNER. I think the Senator has stated all that is in the paper.

Mr. HOAR. Let me have it read, so that the two things will get together in the RECORD.

Mr. FAULKNER. I want to get through with the bill by 2 o'clock.

Mr. HOAR. I have no doubt; but these foreign adventurers will not get through their marriages before 2 o'clock. I want to see the matter carefully protected. Let the paper be read. It is very short.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary proceeded to read the paper.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from West Virginia is anxious to get through with the bill before 2 o'clock, and the rest of the paper, the substance of which I stated, may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The paper is as follows:

Senator HOAR:

I address myself to that section of the proposed marriage law introduced by Senator FAULKNER which relates to licenses to marry foreigners in this country or this District.

The evil sought to be corrected by this proposed section (which I suggested myself to Senator FAULKNER) arises out of the following conditions:

The requisites of a valid marriage are not the same in Germany, France, and, possibly, other countries, as they are in the United States. Possibly they may not be exactly the same in England as in the United States. For example, a deceased wife's sister might make a valid marriage in the United States and which might not be valid in England. In Germany no man in the army may marry without the consent of his Sovereign. In France no man under 25 may marry without the consent of his parents, and if over 25 he may not marry without giving his parents notice thereof, to the end that they may make objection if they desire. There are many provisions of the marriage laws of these countries which are directory only, and it makes no difference in the validity of the marriage whether they are observed or not; but the foregoing are fundamental and are absolutely requisite to the making of a valid marriage and one which will be recognized by the laws of these countries, whatever ceremony may have been performed, and however legal it might have been in the country where performed.

So true is this that a marriage ceremony might be performed in the United States by an archbishop or cardinal of the Roman Catholic Church, one which would be recognized as valid by the Pope of Rome, and yet it would be void, or at least voidable, when contested in the courts of either of the countries mentioned, and possibly of others. To such extent is this true that a cause célèbre in Illinois may be cited in illustration: A man born in Germany attained about his majority owing military duty, emigrated to Illinois. He settled there, bought a farm, married a wife, reared a family of children, and lived there for twenty-five years, growing quite well off, and having considerable landed property. At the end of twenty-five years he returned to Germany, there became enamored of a woman, and sought her in marriage. The return to his domicile of origin, together with the German laws against expatriation, coupled with the fact of his unperformed military duty, made it comparatively easy, when in accordance with his desire, for him to regain his citizenship in his own (German) country. This once established, he commenced proceedings in the courts of that country for a divorce from his Illinois wife.

It does not appear that he proceeded secretly, or without her knowledge, and, indeed, there was no necessity for it, for the law of his country was all on his side. The facts were undoubted, he owed the military service, and whatever pretended marriage he had made was without the consent of his Sovereign or superior. The divorce was granted and he married his German wife, lived with her for some time, had children, then died. His German wife was appointed administratrix of his estate in the jurisdiction of his domicile at the time of his death. Armed with this authority she went to Illinois and demanded to be appointed administratrix of the estate there. The Illinois wife resisted the application, and the case was taken to the supreme court of the State, which decided that the decedent had become domiciled in Germany, that the German courts had full jurisdiction over both the divorce and the administration of his estate, and that their decision upon these two questions was binding upon all other courts, especially those of Illinois, and so they decided in favor of the German wife, and the Illinois wife was driven out from her home and left penniless.

This is only one illustration. There are hundreds of cases which have happened showing the inequality and iniquity growing out of such proceedings. We are to be thankful that every foreigner who goes to another country and there marries a wife is not a villain, but there are enough of them to make this an evil requiring correction. A Frenchman who, under 25 years of age, marries an English or American girl without the consent of his parents, or, if over 25, without notice to them, can bring his wife to Paris, walk into his own or his father's residence, and at the door can turn his wife and children away as vagabonds and dissolute persons, and if she or they shall claim the man as husband or father the law of France against la recherché de paternité prohibits any investigation, and if they ask for support or maintenance they can be arrested as blackmailers.

To such an extent has this been carried—and only a few cases are sufficient—that England and France, for the purpose of correcting the evil, have entered into a convention by which, under the decree of the French Government and the notification by Jules Ferry, President, all consuls of France on duty in England were directed to examine, upon the proper application of any French citizen proposing marriage in England, whether the requisite of French law had been satisfied, so that the marriage when made in England and in accordance with English law would be held valid in France. Under this convention these void or voidable marriages of French citizens made in England have ceased practically.

It is to bring about substantially this condition of affairs that the particular section of the bill introduced by Senator FAULKNER in relation to marriages in the District of Columbia was introduced, and this is the evil sought to be corrected thereby.

The Congress can not accomplish it in the same way as was done by England. To make a treaty or convention is within the jurisdiction of the Executive only, and it appears as though the only method for the legislative bodies to act is (1) by educating the people and calling their attention to the condition of affairs, so that parents and friends of brides can see that the necessary steps under foreign laws have been taken, to the end that the marriage made within the District and valid according to our laws shall be equally valid and binding in the domicile of the husband or the country to which he may belong; (2) by providing that the license shall not be issued or the ceremony performed until the requisites of the foreign law to make a valid marriage shall have been complied with. The section in question seeks to accomplish it by the latter method, while the first method of relief will go out of the discussion.

But the section proposed by Senator FAULKNER, while eminently good so far as it goes, will not accomplish the desired end. It takes cognizance of the conditions and seeks to remedy them by requiring the oath of the foreigner proposing marriage that all the legal requirements of his country have been complied with. This, however, will be of no avail, because: (1) The marriage does not become invalid nor in the slightest degree affected until after the parties shall have departed this country and established themselves in their foreign country. In fact, so long as they reside in this country the marriage is valid and binding, and no prosecution for perjury would lie. It is only after they shall have returned to their own country that it becomes necessary, and then it is unavailing. (2) The foreigner married here, and who has taken this oath here, may remain in this country in quietness and peace a happily married man until the statute of limitation against the perjury committed at the time of his marriage shall have expired, as in the case of the Illinois man, many times over.

Therefore I propose that the case requires an additional remedy, something beyond simply the oath of the proposed foreign husband. To demand his oath is all right; it would have a deterring effect, but it is not sufficient, and the necessary amendments should be made by which some officer—either the licensing officer or the officiating clergyman—should have the right and authority to examine the bridegroom under oath and to ask questions such as might be deemed necessary in order to satisfy him that these legal requirements had been complied with. The object of this is to prevent the issuance of the license and the performance of the marriage ceremony until it shall be known with reasonable certainty that the marriage about to be celebrated, and which is valid and binding upon the wife, wherever she may live, is equally binding upon the husband when he shall return to the country of which he is a citizen or subject.

Yours, very truly, THOMAS WILSON.

Mr. FAULKNER. I am satisfied——

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, he suggests instead of the amendment prohibiting the solemnization of marriage the amendment should provide that the clerk shall not issue the license.

Mr. FAULKNER. That the clerk shall not issue the license. In other words, the theory of the bill is to have all the evidence in the validity of the marriage in the clerk's office. The amendment that I submitted yesterday and which was adopted was suggested to me by the gentleman who has suggested the same thing to the Senator from Massachusetts. I thought I had made the provision sufficiently stringent to bring that to the attention of the clerk, and hoped then to call the attention of the State Department to the necessity of entering into such an arrangement with England and Germany, those two countries especially, as England has done with France, in reference to the certificate necessary to show the right of a native of either of those countries to enter into the contract of marriage.

Mr. HOAR. I have corrected the amendment according to the Senator's suggestion. Let it be read again.

Mr. FAULKNER. Yes; let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a new section, after section 4:

No license for any marriage shall hereafter be issued to which any citizen of a foreign country shall be a party until a minister or consul representing such foreign country——

Mr. HOAR. It is not necessary to read the whole of it unless some one desires it. That is the only change. Instead of addressing the prohibition to the minister, it is addressed to the clerk in issuing the license, and the minister of course can not perform the marriage without the license.

Mr. FAULKNER. I should like to hear the whole of it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the remainder of the amendment.

The Secretary read as follows:

Until a minister or consul representing such foreign country in the United States shall certify that the conditions to the validity of the marriage of the laws of such country shall have been complied with.

Mr. FAULKNER. I see no objection to that amendment. It is exactly in accordance with the rule adopted between England and France, as has been suggested.

Mr. CALL. I should like to hear the amendment read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert a new section, to follow section 4, as follows:

No license for any marriage shall hereafter be issued to which any citizen of a foreign country shall be a party until a minister or consul representing such foreign country in the United States shall certify that the conditions to the validity of the marriage of the laws of such country shall have been complied with.

Mr. CALL. That seems to me to be a very dangerous amendment. It is a limitation upon the right to marry, and prevents the marriage of a foreigner in this country until he shall have complied with the laws of his native country. For instance, if he were a soldier in the German army and not properly discharged, and should escape here, it seems to me it would be quite a hardship to say that he should not marry in this country because the law of Germany forbids a soldier not properly discharged and escaping from the army from marrying there.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, this provision does not make the marriage void at all. It only prohibits the minister from solemnizing it until this has been done; and without such a provision, if the man still retains his foreign citizenship and takes his wife back to his native country, she goes back as a concubine and not as a lawful wife, although she may believe herself lawfully married according to our law. It is only to protect our citizens against adventurers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask that the numbering of the other sections from 4 down be changed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALES AND PROCEEDS OF SALES OF BONDS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution as to sales and proceeds of sales of bonds, offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] yesterday, may go over until Monday, retaining its place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PEFFER. I give notice now of an amendment which I shall propose when the resolution comes up. I shall move to strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert the following as a substitute for the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts:

That a committee of five Senators shall be appointed by the Vice-President, whose duty it shall be—

First. To investigate and report generally all the material facts and circumstances connected with the sale of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury in the years 1894, 1895, and 1896.

Second. To investigate and report specially what amount of available funds, classified, was in the United States Treasury and on deposit in other places, subject to the order of the Secretary of the Treasury, at the time the bonds were sold or offered for sale; whether there was or was not coin enough on hand to meet all coin obligations of the Government due at the time said bonds were sold or when they were offered for sale; what obligations were due at that time and the amount of each, stated separately; what was the reason for any unusual withdrawal of coin from the Treasury shortly before bonds were sold or offered for sale, if such unusual withdrawals were in fact made, and by what persons or classes of persons and for what purpose or on what account such withdrawals were made; who purchased the bonds, in what amounts, and where, whether in the United States or in foreign countries, and in what proportions, and from what persons or classes of persons the gold was procured with which to pay for the bonds, what the bonds sold for, and what was the market price of our Government bonds at the time, and what effect the bond sales had on the credit and business of the people of the United States.

Third. To investigate and report as to the manner of disposing of said bonds, by what authority, and what contracts, advertisements, or proposals were made by the Secretary of the Treasury in relation thereto; what agreements or contracts, and whether oral or in writing, and whether publicly or privately, were entered into by the Secretary of the Treasury and any other person or persons with respect to the sale and purchase of the bonds and what profits were made by the purchasers; whether any officer of the Government, or any person or persons for such officer, and on his behalf, and in his personal interest, and with his knowledge or consent, entered into any contract, agreement, or arrangement, directly or indirectly, with any person or persons, partnership, corporation, company, or syndicate, for the purpose of affecting the price offered or to be offered for said bonds or any of them, with the intent and expectation to receive commission or personal reward by reason of such contract, agreement, or arrangement; whether such contract or agreement had any and what effect on the prices offered for the bonds, what the effect was, and who, if any person, profited by it, and to what extent.

DISTRICT JAIL WALL.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 1780) to provide for the erection of a wall around the jail of the District of Columbia. It will take but a few moments, and it is a very important measure to the District.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The first amendment was in line 3, after the word "dollars," to insert "or so much thereof as may be necessary"; so as to read:

That the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, under the direction of the Attorney-General, in the erection of a brick or stone wall to inclose the grounds upon which the jail in the District of Columbia now stands, including the purchase of material and the employment of such skilled and other labor as may be necessary for the purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "purpose," in line 10, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That one-half the moneys so appropriated shall be paid from the revenues of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISPOSITION OF CONDEMNED ORDNANCE.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. 1865) to authorize the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to make certain disposition of condemned ordnance, guns, and cannon balls in their respective Departments. It will lead to no debate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment, after the word "Department," in line 10, to insert:

And the Government shall be at no expense in connection with any such loan or gift.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are each hereby authorized, in their discretion, to loan or give to soldiers' monument associations, posts of the Grand Army of the Republic, and municipal corporations, condemned ordnance, guns, and cannon balls which may not be needed in the service of either of said Departments. Such loan or gift shall be made subject to rules and regulations covering the same in each Department, and the Government shall be at no expense in connection with any such loan or gift.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Maine that the words "Soldiers' Homes" be put into the bill as an amendment.

Mr. HALE. I do not know but that that is covered by the phrase of the bill; but there is no harm to be done by the insertion of those words, and I do not object.

Mr. PALMER. I should like to state to the Senator from North Dakota that the other House has passed a bill in respect to the distribution of cannon balls, and there is a general law which authorizes the Secretary of War to furnish guns to the Soldiers' Homes. The Ordnance Department have suggested an amendment to the bill so as to authorize the distribution of cannon balls to the Soldiers' Homes. I have been authorized by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back the substitute which the War Department has furnished, and within a day or two the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have no objection to this bill going through without the amendment I suggested if the Senator from Illinois thinks he will be able to have the bill passed which he has in charge.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT SMITH AND WESTERN COAL RAILROAD.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent to call up for consideration at this time the bill (S. 1617) to grant the Fort Smith and Western Coal Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. COCKRELL. Instead of considering the Senate bill I ask that the bill (H. R. 4153) to grant the Fort Smith and Western Coal Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, may be taken up in its place and considered. The bill is on the table.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. House bill 4153 is in the precise language of the Senate bill, which has been favorably reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs, except as to two provisions. One simply provides that a bridge across a short stream that runs out from the river may be built, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, and the other provides that the whole line of the road shall be located and approved by the Secretary of War before any work shall be begun. These changes have been submitted to a decided majority of the members of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and they approve of them, because the House bill reduces the number of feet given to the railroad company as the right of way, and also for stations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the resolution reported by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] from the Committee on Foreign Relations, relative to war in Cuba.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope, by unanimous consent, that resolution will be temporarily laid aside until this bill can be passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the bill (S. 1617) to grant the Fort Smith and Western Coal Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 5359) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

WAR IN CUBA.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the unfinished business be now proceeded with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAY in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be read.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution reported by Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, February 5, 1896, as a substitute for the concurrent resolution reported January 29, 1896, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That, in the opinion of Congress, a condition of public war exists between the Government of Spain and the government proclaimed and for some time maintained by force of arms by the people of Cuba; and that the United States of America should maintain a strict neutrality between the contending powers, according to each all the rights of belligerents in the ports and territory of the United States.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the resolution submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON], on behalf of the minority of the Committee on Foreign Relations, be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the President is hereby requested to interpose his friendly offices with the Spanish Government for the recognition of the independence of Cuba.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania proposes to offer that as a substitute for the resolution reported by the committee; so it is the first question to be put to the Senate.

Mr. CALL. I understand it is proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania to offer another resolution as an amendment. I desire to be informed on that point.

Mr. CAMERON. That may or may not come later on. All that I shall propose to-day is the resolution which has just been read as a substitute for the resolution of the majority of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON].

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the recognition of independence of Cuba or according belligerent rights, as may be the result of this consideration of the report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, depends rightfully upon the established policy of this Government, upon the condition of the war in Cuba, and the capacity of the people there to assert and maintain their independence. Some other considerations naturally and properly enter into the question. The duty of the United States to interpose in a territory immediately adjacent to her own and with which her people not only now have but must in the future have the most important relations will be determined properly by a consideration of the fact whether or not the interests of civilization, of humanity, the suppression of cruelty and bloodshed, and destruction of property of the most extreme and reprehensible character, are not proper subjects to influence the action of this body and of the Government of the United States.

These considerations all unite in demanding from the United States not only the recognition of the war in Cuba as one between belligerent powers and according belligerent rights to the people of Cuba, now having established an independent government and proclaimed it, but that our Government should recognize the independence of that island.

I will state the facts in regard to the case. The provinces of Spain throughout the American Continent of North and South America during a series of years have asserted their independence and thrown off their allegiance to the Spanish Government, leaving alone the Island of Cuba and an adjacent island subject to the dominion of that Government.

From 1816 until the present time the United States have been appealed to by the people of the different Spanish colonies; first, to recognize them as belligerents, and then to recognize their independence. In every instance of the vast colonial possessions of Spain upon the American Continent the policy of that Government, unfortunately, has provoked a profound discontent, which has resulted in organized revolution on the part of their people. I shall not detain the Senate by reading the different citations which are before me from the several Administrations in power at different periods of time, but with the leave of the Senate shall insert them in the observations which I shall make upon this subject.

Those citations may, however, briefly be stated thus: The United States in reply to the different appeals from the Governments which had overthrown the Spanish dominion—from Chile, Peru, Bolivia, the United States of Colombia, Venezuela, and Mexico—in all those cases the Administration of the United States has affirmed the right of the people to assert their independence and our sympathy with them, and that so far as could be done within the established law of nations they should be recognized as independent republics, and that in the meantime they should have belligerent rights, as Mr. Monroe and his Secretary of State declared, and that free access to all opportunities to purchase anything which could be purchased by any other nation should be accorded to their people struggling for independence.

Until the present Administration, I affirm—having read the history of those several contests—there has not been a single instance in which belligerent rights, with the full and free opportunity of purchase of everything that any other nation might purchase—for that is the language used by Mr. Adams in his correspondence with the agents (not recognized as ministers, but with the agents) of those foreign governments—that every right possessed by a belligerent nation, and the right of purchase freely, without limitation, of munitions of war, and, using the expression, that everything that could be purchased by any other nation, was accorded to them. We know the result of those struggles.

Now, take the instance of Cuba. Our diplomatic history is full upon that subject. From the period shortly preceding the year 1823, up to the present time, revolt after revolt has occurred in the island of Cuba. Our Government, recognizing in its correspondence the extreme disorders in the government of Cuba and the right of the people to establish their revolution, but adhering to the principles of neutrality, and being restrained by the consideration of the peculiar institution, as stated in Mr. Everett's letter, here before me, existing in the Southern States, and the institution of slavery existing in Cuba, and the effect which would be had upon the slave States by the recognition of the independence of Cuba or the disturbance of the colonial dominion of Spain upon this large part of the population of the Southern States, but also considering the importance and the absolute intention and policy of this Government, forbade any acquisition of this island by any foreign country. The right of the Cuban people to assert their independence and the sympathies of the people of the United States with that effort is stated fully and continuously from the days of Mr. Monroe to the present time.

Mr. President, what have we at this time? From 1868 to 1879 the revolt continued. In 1879, not suppressed by violence, after being maintained for ten years with armed forces, a compromise was effected, by which the people of Cuba were promised autonomy and self-government. They were promised a relief from the taxation which covers more than 48 per cent of the entire production of that island, which effectually would crush and destroy the means of subsistence of any other people than those living upon the extremely fertile lands of Cuba. No Cuban is permitted to hold important office. Vast sums of money are paid as rewards for oppressive and cruel exercise of the power of taxation over the people of Cuba, as stated in the manifesto which they have put out. I shall refer for a single moment to this statement:

> At the office of the minister of "Ultramar" (of the colonies), who resides in Madrid, and to whom $96,800 a year are assigned from the treasury of Cuba—

That is the salary of one officer residing in Spain—

> at that office begins the saturnalia in which the Spanish bureaucrats indulge with the riches of Cuba. Sometimes through incapacity, but more frequently for plunder, the money exacted from the Cuban taxpayers is unscrupulously and irresponsibly squandered. It has been demonstrated that the debt of Cuba has been increased in $50,232,500 through Minister Fabie's incapacity.

That is a picture of the administration of that island of 1,600,000 people. I do not desire to speak in terms of harsh and improper censure of Spain. This paper continues:

> At the time this minister was in power the Spanish Bank disposed of twenty millions from the Cuban treasury, which were to be carried in account-current at the disposal of the minister for the famous operation of withdrawing the paper currency. Cuba paid the interest on these millions, and continued paying it all the time they were utilized by the bank. Minister Romero Robledo took at one time (in 1892) $1,000,000 belonging to the treasury of Cuba from the vaults of the Bank of Spain and lent it to the Transatlantic Company, of which he was a stockholder. This was done in defiance of law and without any authorization whatever. The minister was threatened with prosecution; but he haughtily replied that if prosecuted all his predecessors from every political party, would have to accompany him to the court. That threat came to nothing.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator permit me to inquire from what he reads?

Mr. CALL. I read from the manifesto put forth by the Cuban government in making the declaration of their independence.

Mr. MORGAN. Has that paper been sent by our Government to Congress?

Mr. CALL. Oh, no; that paper has not been sent us. This is a public manifesto published by the Cuban government, and is not an official document. It is signed by Enrique José Varona. I suppose that he has official connection with the Cuban government.

> In June of 1890 there was a scandalous debate in the Spanish Cortes, in which some of the frauds committed upon the Cuban treasury were, not for the first time, brought to light. It was then made public that $6,500,000 had been abstracted from the "Caja de Depositos," notwithstanding that the safe was locked with three keys, and each one was in the possession of a different functionary. Then it was known that, under the pretext of false vouchers for transportation and fictitious bills for provisions during the previous war, defalcations had been found afterwards amounting to $22,811,516.

That is presented for consideration as a justification and vindication of the action on the part of the Cuban people, an action which has been continuous, beginning in 1868, in consequence of the refusal to grant to the Cubans any kind of influence in the imposition of the taxes upon themselves, until the taxing of the Cuban people has grown to be, under the influence of those methods, so oppressive as to deprive the great mass of the people of power to procure the ordinary necessaries of life and to place the island, with the exception of a few large estates, in a complete condition of poverty; and that the richest island in the world.

> But the naked figures of the Cuban budgets and of the Cuban debt tell very little in regard to their true importance and signification as machines to squeeze out the substance of a people's labor. It is necessary to examine closer the details of these accounts and expenditures.
> Those of Cuba, according to the last budgets or appropriations, amount to $26,411,314, distributed as follows:

General obligations	$12,884,549.55
Department of justice (courts, etc.)	1,006,308.51
Department of war	5,918,598.16
Department of the treasury	727,892.45
Department of the navy	1,091,969.65
Government, administration	4,035,071.43
Interior improvements (Fomento)	746,922.15

> There are in Cuba 1,631,687 inhabitants, according to the last census, that of 1887. That is to say, this budget burdens them in the proportion of $16.18 for each inhabitant. The Spaniards in Spain pay only 42.06 pesetas per head. Reducing the Cuban dollars to pesetas at the exchange rate of $95 for 500 pesetas, there results that the Cubans have to pay a tribute of 85.16 pesetas for each inhabitant; more than double the amount a Spaniard has to pay in his European country.

We can form some idea of the condition of the people from that statement.

This revolt was brought about by the intelligent and educated Spaniards who live in Cuba, natives of Cuba, and I undertake to affirm that no country, no period of time, presents a record of more distinguished ability, more heroism, more patriotism, more self-sacrifice and courage than that which is presented by the effort of the people to establish their independence. For ten years up to 1868 and 1870 they maintained the struggle. Hundreds and thousands of them were put to death, the women outraged, the children slaughtered, and authentic accounts in our own records here and by our own officials are presented to us for the truth of those statements.

This disorder and this oppression and this cruelty in the administration of the island continued until last year. Our Government, under General Grant, not only demanded but implored, desired, and suggested in every form of diplomatic intercourse certain reforms in Cuba to the Spanish Government, but finally the promises, under the seal of Martinez Campos, were denied. The record in this book shows how they were denied; how this continued imposition grew and grew, until it has resulted in taxation more than twice as great upon each inhabitant of the Island of Cuba as that imposed upon the subjects of Spain in Europe.

These people again declared their independence, again assembled and proclaimed a provisional constitution similar to our own, again assembled in arms, and last summer commenced what may be considered a continuous revolt, as was the case in the other South American Republics.

This correspondence shows that the agent of Venezuela informed the Government of the United States that the Spanish Government maintained a great army in Venezuela during the whole period of their controversy, and this armed force was still maintained at the time when the Government of the United States recognized their independence. So also with Chile; so with Peru; but these colonies had met in a congress and proclaimed their independence, and defended it for a period of time similar to that of the revolution of 1868 in Cuba, with the single exception that the people in Cuba laid down their arms temporarily under the promise of autonomy of self-government, of practical independence, subordinated to Spain by an authority like the Canadian Government and Great Britain, of a nominal connection between some of its departments. With that single exception the cases are alike in the Spanish South American colonies and in Cuba. The Spanish forces were defeated time and again, but they still, at the period of the recognition of their independence by Mr. Monroe, and the sending of a minister to them, maintained armed forces, still asserted the sovereignty and dominion of Spain over these South American Republics, which had erected, preserved, and maintained a government of their own.

I shall not detain the Senate by reading at length from the diplomatic reports which I have here before me, and which I may print for the information of any who may desire to read them, but I will now look at the status of the war in Cuba to see whether or not, as asserted by Mr. Fish, the longer preservation of the colonial relation between Spain and Cuba, and the sovereignty of Spain over that island, can be preserved—whether the independence of that country is not, as stated by him ten years ago, an inevitable fact.

If that be true, what motive of policy can exist that our Government should permit the destructive, cruel, and bloody war to continue, when, without offense to the law of nations and the declarations in all our diplomatic correspondence, we may rightfully recognize the independence of the government of Cuba established by the Cuban people.

Let us see what is the status of this war. I will read from the report made to Congress by the President of the United States in answer to a resolution of the House of Represenatives. Mr. Pulaski F. Hyatt, United States consul at Santiago de Cuba, under date of May 4, 1895, in the beginning of this struggle, writes as follows:

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Santiago de Cuba, May 4, 1895.

SIR: I have the honor very respectfully to report that there arrived at this port during the present week about 2,000 recruits for the Spanish army, making in all about 10,000 that have been landed at this port alone during the past five weeks.

On April 25 a battle occurred near —— between Colonel Bosch, commanding 450 Government troops, and Gen. José Maceo, commanding 650 insurgents. The Government forces were driven back into town with considerable loss. General Maceo later gave permission to Colonel Bosch to gather up the dead and wounded.

On May 1 a fight occurred near Santa Ana with about 300 men on each side. No particular advantage seemed to have been gained by either party. Both sides are reported to have lost from 10 to 15 killed.

During the past week about 100 young men have left Santiago to join the insurgent forces. Many of these young men belonged to the better families of the town, which gives a new phase to the uprising.

It is my judgment that both sides are about as well prepared for the contest as they are likely to be in the near future. The good name of Gen. Martinez Campos adds strength to the Government side of the question, but the insurgents nevertheless show no signs of weakening.

I am, etc.,

PULASKI F. HYATT, Consul.

On the 11th of May Mr. Hyatt says:

Monday night the rebels attacked Cristo, a town 10 miles distant, on the Sabinilla and Maroto Railroad, derailed an engine, and burned two bridges. The road is operated and owned mostly by American citizens. Martinez Campos has recommended Government aid to this road for the purpose of extending the same and furnishing employment to the many men who will soon be thrown out of employment by the shutting down of sugar mills, and it is feared that without work the men will drift into the rebel army. Martinez Campos's proposition is that Spain shall loan the railroad company $20,000 per month while the road is building, which shall be gradually returned after the road is completed. An agent of the company has gone to the States to consult with the stockholders.

The Government commenced holding back blasting powder from the Paragon Iron Mining Company (American) to an extent that crippled mining operations. The reason given was that the powder might fall into the hands of the rebels and be used for war purposes. Mr. Ziegenfus, the superintendent, informed the Government officials that if he could not have powder enough to keep going he would close the mines, and it was for them to consider whether they wanted these men turned loose without employment. This had the desired effect, and blasting powder is now handed out freely.

Friends of the insurrection claim that they are as far advanced now at the end of three months as they were at the end of three years in the former rebellion. They claim now to have 10,000 men under arms in the province of Santiago and to have 4,000 more doing effective work.

Morlot Lacret and Roloff el Polaco, two chiefs of the former rebellion, are reported to have landed on Wednesday at Portillo with arms and ammunition for the insurgents.

An effort is now being made to get resident volunteers to enlist on the side of the Government, with what success I am unable to say.

On the 18th of May he says:

On Sunday morning last a deserted schooner without name was discovered near this place, which is supposed to have landed men and munitions of war for the insurgents. A similar case is reported to have happened near Manzanillo a few days earlier.

The uprising at the extreme eastern end of the island and around Baracoa is reported to be general.

On Monday, the 13th, 400 men are said to have left Holquin in a body to take up arms against the Government.

Perhaps the most sanguinary battle that has taken place up to the present time occurred on the 13th and 14th instant, near Guantanamo. The Spanish authorities claim that with 400 men they put to rout the enemy, 3,400 strong, inflicting severe loss on the rebels.

The rebels claim that there were over 2,000 Spaniards engaged in the first day's battle, and that they punished them severely, driving them into the town and inflicting a loss of over 200 in killed and wounded, including among the killed the commander, Colonel Bosch, and several other officers, while their own loss was insignificant; but finding that on the second day the Government forces had been strengthened, they thought it prudent to retire.

And the statements from this consul go on up to the present time, showing almost every day a battle between the insurgent forces and the armed and regular forces of Spain, and they exhibit the fact that in all these cases he reports victories on the part of the insurgent forces, contrary to the reports which we see in the newspapers of Spanish engagements, and he reports that the people of Cuba are unanimous that in these different contests they have maintained by force of arms their superiority and their control of the island. These facts are to be found in this diplomatic correspondence of the consul of the United States at Santiago de Cuba.

Mr. President, if this be so—and that is the information we have from a reliable authority, from our own consular agent, giving dates, giving numbers, and giving the circumstances that surround the case and confirming his statements—I ask the question, Spain having acknowledged the belligerent rights of the Southern Confederacy, and England having acknowledged the belligerent rights of the Southern Confederacy in its very inception, we having acknowledged the sovereign right of the new Government of France in the very first days of its existence, having these examples before our eyes of the action of our own Government in recognizing the independence of the revolted Spanish colonies, what reason can we now give for withholding our recognition of the independence of Cuba, when we see that blood is running from the cruel and brutal outrages committed upon the people of Cuba for the purpose of suppressing by cruelty, and not by force of arms, what? Their aspirations for freedom under the lessons which we have taught and the advice which we have given to them.

What grounds of public policy are there to be considered in this matter? Can Spain preserve her dominion of Cuba? We have said for many years that she can not. Is it to her interest that she should continue this terrible war? Is it to our interest, as a matter of policy, that Cuba should be destroyed and that reprisals of blood and murder, the shooting of prisoners captured in war, and the killing of people who were found away from their homes shall be continued? I call attention to the recent order of the Spanish general, with power of life and death over every human being in that island, for the summary shooting of all Cubans found away from their homes without a pass or a license or a permit, his proclamation of death to be inflicted by his subordinates upon suspicion alone of any kind of complicity, of any kind of sympathy, with the rebellion and the attempt to establish the independence of Cuba.

Mr. President, this is the result of our action. We proclaim that if there be any shipment of arms for the purpose of aiding the insurgents they shall be arrested by our people. We proclaim the utmost rigor, not only in the detention of vessels and expeditions which may be openly ascertained and proclaimed to be for the purpose of aiding the insurgents, but in every possible method of inquisition where they sail for another country, for another port, and have on board munitions of war of any kind, we take all the circumstances surrounding the case to prove that their destination is to the Island of Cuba, and we are waging this war ourselves against the Cuban people by these acts of ours of extreme and severe exercise of the power to prevent aid and sympathy and active assistance to them.

I have made a very brief statement, Mr. President, and I do not propose to detain the Senate for any great length of time; but I do affirm that no argument has been made, and, in my opinion, no argument can be made, against the passage of a resolution not only recognizing the belligerency, but that which would be very well to accompany it and in harmony with it, recognizing the absolute independence of the government of Cuba.

It has been said, first appeal to Spain. Why? General Grant did that; Mr. Fish did that. Here is the correspondence. Mr. Fish, through our minister to Spain, said to Spain in regard to Cuba, "We can not permit any other country to own and possess Cuba. The policy of the United States demands, because of its proximity and its commercial relations and its relations to the military defense and to the sanitary conditions of this country, that we should exercise our power to prevent its transfer to any other government; and it is impossible that you can maintain your Government over those people for any great length of time. Why not recognize the fact and accept the friendly offices of the United States for mediation, send no more troops there, stop these unheard-of atrocities which shock the conscience and sentiment of the American people and of the civilized world?" What was the answer Spain gave, and gave under that enlightened general who has been removed because he said, "If you want the atrocity repeated of 300 students shot and murdered in cold blood because they would not renounce their devotion to the independence of their native country, you must find some other person than I to do it"? Under this enlightened, this humane man's administration she promised to the Cuban people that if they would lay down their arms under the mediation of the United States they should have independence. But Spain said to this Government,

"It is not your business. We will not recognize your right to interfere. Spain will agree with you that she will moderate and ameliorate the conditions of war and grant reforms to Cuba, but she will not, and does not, recognize your right to mediate or interfere in the affairs of Spain."

Now, Mr. President, what reason is there for our appealing to Spain? The act of recognition, says Mr. Monroe, and so say all our Presidents down to Mr. Buchanan, and so said General Grant, is not an act of war. We did not consider Spain as making war upon us when she recognized the independence of the Confederate States and accorded to them belligerent rights. We did not consider it an act of war when England accorded belligerent rights to the Confederate Government in the very first days of its existence. Why not, then, pass not only this resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations and the substitute resolution for belligerency, but also pass a resolution for the complete independence of Cuba and neutrality between these contending powers? That is what I desire to be done, and that is what I shall ask to be done before this debate is ended and this resolution is voted upon.

Mr. CAMERON Mr. President, the views which I have presented to the Senate for the minority of the Committee on Foreign Relations contain the reasoning on which, in my opinion, its proposed action should be founded. I have nothing to add to that statement. It is intended to recall our Government to the old and established policy of the United States. The last of our Presidents who had to deal with the subject of Cuban revolt was General Grant. At a later period I had the honor of serving as a member of General Grant's Cabinet, and I feel that I have the right, and perhaps the duty, of asserting a policy which he strongly held.

For my own part I regard the question of belligerency as a false issue—a mistake, into which the friends of Cuba should not fall. If Spain wishes to impede or delay effective action on our part, she will encourage us to waste our energy and our initiative in struggling with the legal difficulties that involve this question of belligerency, which, when stripped of all its popular notions, is at most an empty, or perhaps a mischievous, legal form.

I object to it, in the first place, for the same reasons which caused General Grant to reject it in 1875, because it is offensive to Spain and delusive to Cuba. The contest is no longer one of belligerency but one of independence.

In the second place I object to it because it concedes to Spain the belligerent right of searching our ships on the high seas, and seizing them whenever they have anything on board which can be considered contraband of war. You will observe that the resolution proposed by the majority does not mention the rights of belligerency on the high seas, but it confers them nevertheless.

I object to it in the third place because it imposes belligerent duties as well as belligerent rights and relieves Spain of all further responsibility for the destruction of American property in Cuba by transferring that responsibility to the insurgents. The insurgents hitherto have been alone obliged to destroy property for military objects, and the belligerent duty will work to their injury alone.

For my own part, I wish the Government to act. I want to see the chronic misery of Cuba ended. I know that the course I favor was the fixed policy of the Republican party of the United States and of the American people. The course I prefer is, as I believe, the true expression of public feeling, which is unanimous in demanding action in favor of freedom. I do not wish or intend to antagonize the action of the committee in its assertion of the fact that the Cubans are belligerents—a fact which hardly needs discussion. The true question is whether the Government had best satisfy itself with the assertion of that fact or whether it should do more.

For such Senators as wish to affirm more strongly their loyalty to the professions and traditions of the American people, I shall, in a few minutes, offer a substitute for the concurrent resolution.

It was my intention to make only a few brief remarks in reference to belligerency. I think, however, that it would not be amiss to refer to the views of the minority of the Committee on Foreign Relations, in which the condition of Cuba for the last few years is very faithfully set forth.

So long ago as 1875, Mr. Cushing, then minister to Madrid, communicated to our Government a large amount of evidence from Spanish sources showing the demoralization existing in the administration in Cuba. The Spanish journals of that date openly informed the central government that war in Cuba could never be ended until the vices of the ultra-marine administration were corrected and its moral tone raised. Spain was exhorted to make one supreme effort for the pacification of Cuba and its moralization.

Mr. Cushing said:

> The journals of all shades of opinion speak of the official corruption and peculations of the public employees in Cuba as a feature of the situation not less calamitous than the insurrection.

He remarked that the burden of taxation had become intolerable, aggravated as it was by the frauds and wastes committed by almost everybody connected with the collection or expenditure of the public moneys; that the abuses of administration, of which so much was being said at that time, were old, chronic, deep-rooted, and impossible of eradication under the colonial régime.

To quote his language:

> It would seem that each of the ephemeral parties on attaining power, with a crowd of eager partisans behind it like troops of howling wolves, shakes off as many as it can upon Cuba.

Notwithstanding that the public press did not cease to advise the Government that the immorality of the public administration of the island offered a vast field to censure, nothing was done to improve its condition. It was thought by the central government that it was only necessary by force to save Cuba to Spain. It was common remark, however, that the Government ought to sustain two campaigns in Cuba—one against insurrection and the other against corruption. Said Mr. Cushing:

> So merely mercenary and so regardless of duty and the public weal are many of the public officers who go out to the island as to cause the saying to become current that on embarking they leave all sense of shame behind them in Cadiz.

And he observed that all testimony was unanimous as to the corruptions and the embezzlements of the administrations of Cuba.

The testimony of Mr. Cushing is of the most convincing character, as he has never been accused of being unfriendly to Spain. That he did not draw a too highly colored picture of Spanish misrule is shown by the declaration of the minister of transmarine affairs at Madrid, in an official paper quoted by Mr. Fish in 1874. This paper states:

> A deplorable and pertinacious tradition of despotism which, if it could ever be justified, is without a shadow of reason at the present time, intrusted the direction and management of our colonial establishment to the agents of the metropolis, destroying, by their dominant and exclusive authority, the vital energies of the country and the creative and productive activity of free individuals. And although the system may now have improved in some of its details, the domineering action of the authorities being less felt, it still appears full of the original error, which is upheld by the force of tradition, and the necessary influence of interests created under their protection. A change of system, political as well as administrative, is therefore imperatively demanded.

Mr. President, the Spanish Government to-day in Cuba is of the same character as it was when Richard Henry Dana visited the island in 1854, "an armed monarchy encamped in the midst of a disarmed and disfranchised people; an unmixed despotism of one nation over another." Dana warned the public against the testimony of Americans and other foreigners engaged in business in Cuba as to the condition of affairs there. He said:

> Of all classes of persons, I know of none whose situation is more unfavorable to the growth and development of sentiments of patriotism and philanthropy and of interest in the future of a race than foreigners temporarily resident, for purposes of money-making only, in a country with which they have nothing in common in the future or the past.

We might well consider that statement in connection with our own country.

> This class is often called impartial. I do not agree to the use of that term. They are indeed free from the bias of feeling or sentiment, but they are subject to the attractions of interest. It is for their immediate advantage to preserve peace and the existing order of things.

The condition of Cuba had not improved prior to the present war, as is shown by a report of our consul-general at Havana to the State Department in 1885. This states that the entire population, with the exception of the official class, was living under a tyranny unparalleled at this day on the globe. Our consul-general at that time said:

> There is a system of oppression and torture which enters into every phase of life, eats into the soul of every Cuban, mortifies, injures, and insults him every hour, impoverishes him and his family from day to day, threatens the rich man with bankruptcy and the poor man with beggary. The exactions of the Spanish Government and the illegal outrages of its officers are in fact intolerable. They have reduced the island to despondency and ruin. * * * The Government at Madrid is directly answerable for the misery of Cuba and for the rapacity and venality of its subordinates. * * * No well-informed Spaniard imagines that Cuba will long continue to submit to this tyranny, or at least that she will long be able to yield this harvest to her oppressors. Spain cares nothing whatever for the interests, the prosperity, or the sufferings of her colony. The Government does almost nothing to ameliorate any of the evils of the country. The police are everywhere insufficient and inefficient. The roads are no roads at all. Every interest which might enrich and improve the island is looked upon by the officials as one more mine to exploit. * * * Cuba is held solely for the benefit of Spain and Spanish interests, for the sake of Spanish adventurers. Against this all rebel in thought and feeling if not yet in fact and deed. * * * They wish protection from the grasping rapacity of Spain and see no way to attain it except by our aid.

In 1875, when the situation was very far from being so serious as it is now, President Grant, after long consideration of the difficulties involved in public action, decided against the recognition of belligerency as an act which might be delusive to the insurgents and would certainly be regarded as unfriendly by Spain. He decided upon a middle course. He proposed to the Spanish Government a sort of intervention which should establish the independence of Cuba by a friendly agreement. In doing so he not only necessarily recognized both parties to the conflict as on an equal plane, but he also warned Spain that if such mediation should not be accepted direct intervention would probably be deemed a necessity on the part of the United States.

Spain preferred to promise to the insurgents terms so favorable as to cause for a time the cessation of hostilities. Since then twenty years have passed. The insurrection, far from having ceased, has taken the proportions of a war almost as destructive to our own citizens as to the contending parties. The independence of Cuba was then regarded by the President of the United States as the object of his intervention, and has now become far more inevitable than it was then. Evidently the Government of the United States can do no less than to take up the subject precisely where President Grant left it, and to resume the friendly mediation which he actually began with all the consequences which necessarily would follow its rejection.

Mr. President, if the substitute, which is in the nature of a joint resolution, is passed by Congress and signed by the President, and if Spain gives it no attention, at an early day I shall offer a resolution for the immediate recognition of the independence of Cuba.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I united with the rest of the Committee on Foreign Relations, with a single exception, in reporting the concurrent resolution which is now before the Senate. I will say, however, with perfect frankness, that I for one should be very glad if the Senate should see fit to go further in this direction, for I believe that the time has come when the United States should use their good offices to bring to an end the deplorable condition of affairs which now exists in the Island of Cuba. In my opinion the course which would meet with universal approbation of our own people and command the respect of the world would be to offer our good offices to mediate between Spain and the Cubans in order to restore peace and give independence to the island which Spain can no longer hold.

I think there are very few matters which are of more immediate importance to the people of the United States than this, not merely because their sympathies are engaged, but also because in the condition of that island and in its future are involved large and most serious interests of the United States.

When all the Spanish colonies, under the impulse of our Revolution and of the still greater movement of the French Revolution, finally broke away from the mother country, Cuba alone adhered to the Spanish cause. Among all the Spanish-American colonies Cuba was the Abdiel, "among the faithless, faithful only he." Her reward was the title of "Faithful Cuba," and that was the only reward she ever received. There was no change in the Government of Spain as applied to the inhabitants of that island. Oppression continued; they were plundered by corrupt officials; they were thwarted in their efforts toward public education, and they were used only as a source from which Spain and Spanish officials could draw a revenue, legitimate or illegitimate.

At last such oppressions brought revolution. The Cubans rose and rose again. The last revolution before the present one, with which we are all familiar, began in 1868. It endured for ten years. It was subdued, or, rather, it was brought to an end, only by the solemn promise of the Spanish commander pledging the faith of Spain to give to the Cubans those rights and privileges to which they felt they were entitled and for which they had fought.

The moment the war of 1868 came to an end those promises were cast aside. They were all disregarded, punishment was meted out to those who had been engaged in insurrection, and the old system went on with all its injustice, with all its oppression, with all its dishonesty. Such a course could have but one result. The Cubans prepared for another revolution, and just a year ago it began. It began in the eastern part of the island with a small band of 500 men. In the vast wilderness of lying bulletins that come from Spanish sources it is very difficult, and it is not worth while, perhaps, to try, to trace the details of the battles which have been fought. But there are certain great facts which there is no mistaking. Those men who started so feebly a year ago in the eastern part of the island have swept over the island from one end to the other. The 500 have grown until to-day even the hostile accounts represent them at 45,000 in the field.

We know that the railroad lines are cut; that the telegraph wires are down; that every report of a Spanish victory which comes to us in the newspapers is followed by the statement of a fresh insurgent advance. We know, as a matter of fact, that the whole of that island to-day, except where the Spanish fleets ride at anchor and where the Spanish armies are encamped, is in the hands of the insurgents. We know that they have formed a government; that they have held two elections; that every officer in the army holds his commission from the civil government which they have established. We know the terms of the provisional government, and in the presence of these facts, and of the fighting that those men have done, I think it is not unreasonable of them to ask some recognition at the hands of the people of the United States. They have risen against oppression, compared to which the oppression which led us to rebel against England is as dust in the balance, and they feel that for this reason, if no other, they should have the sympathy of the people of the United States.

Martinez Campos, the ablest general in Spain, has been recalled because he failed to put down the insurrection—recalled when the insurgent troops had been actually in the suburbs of Habana—and in his place has been sent a man whose only reputation known to the world is that of the most cold-blooded brutality in the last war for liberty in that island. That is the actual condition of Cuba to-day, speaking broadly and without reference to the details of actions or skirmishes.

Now, Mr. President, the question arises, and I think the time has come and more than come to decide it, What are the duties of the United States in the presence of this war? What action should we take in regard to a condition of affairs which lies right at our threshold. We have heard a good deal in some of the recent debates of the ties of kindred, of our gratitude to other nations with whom we happen to be in controversy, and of how much consideration we should show for the nations of Europe in regard to matters where the interests of the United States are involved. Whatever may be said as to our relations to some other countries, I think the relations of this country to Spain offer no ties of gratitude or of blood. If that for which the Spanish Empire has stood since the days of Charles V is right, then everything for which the United States stands and has always stood is wrong. If the principles that we stand for are right, then the principles of which Spain has been the great exponent in history are utterly wrong.

Among the people who first settled in the United States, whose blood flows in American veins to-day, were to be found Hollanders, who, weak in numbers, but strong of heart, there among their dikes on the borders of the North Sea, first made head against the oppression of the Spanish Empire. Mr. President, in your own State of Delaware [Mr. GRAY in the chair] the first settlers were the men who had followed the "Lion of the North," the Protestant champion, when he stayed the oncoming of Spain and Austria on the plains of Germany. The great English-speaking people who settled here and who largely outnumber all others are the descendants of the men who stood with Drake and with Hawkins, of that small band of English Protestant seamen who curbed the power of Spain in the days of her greatest authority, and whose guns in the English Channel "pealed the Armada's knell." In my own portion of the country are the people who draw their blood from those who followed Blake into the Mediterranean, from the Ironsides of Cromwell, of whom it has been written that even the "banished cavaliers felt an emotion of pride when they beheld a brigade of their own countrymen, outnumbered by foes and abandoned by friends, drive before them in headlong route the finest infantry of Spain, and force a passage through a counterscarp which had been pronounced impregnable by the greatest of the marshals of France."

Such are the men, such are the races which have done most to settle and build up the United States. It is from those people that we derive all that we hold dear and all in which we most believe, and they fought their way to liberty against the power and bigotry of Spain, which was then the great force of the European world.

Come down, Mr. President, to a later time. Come down to the first decade of the century. The great empire of Charles V and Philip II still preserved the outward seeming at least of being what it once had been. Those were the days before the Spanish colonies had broken away. Those were the days before French armies had marched up and down throughout the length and breadth of the peninsula. Though rotten to the core, the shell of the great Empire still remained; Spain was still accounted one of the great powers of Europe. We were a young nation just struggling to take our place in the great family of nations in those days of difficulty, when the world was convulsed by the Napoleonic wars, and when our own situation was filled with danger.

Turn to the correspondence of the Spanish minister Yrujo under Mr. Jefferson's Administration and read there the friendship of Spain for the United States. Come down to a still later time, when war broke out between the two sections of this country. England, to whom we are now told, we should feel a most intense gratitude—England was the first to thrust her hand into the gaping wound in our body politic and try to rend it still further asunder. France followed, and then Spain. Less than three months after Sumter came the recognition of Spain to the Southern Confederacy.

No, Mr. President, we owe Spain nothing. We have the right to look at this thing purely from the point of view of the interests of humanity and the interests of the United States. There are no ties, no obligations, no traditions to bind us.

Now turn to the other party in this conflict. Turn to the Cubans battling for their liberties. I think, Mr. President, that even the most bitter opponent of the Spanish-Americans would admit that free Cuba, under the constitution which now exists, would be an immense advance in civilization, in all that makes for the progress of humanity, over the government which Spain has given to that island.

The Cubans offer a free press and free speech. Both are suppressed there by Spain. Spain closed a Protestant chapel in the city of Matanzas. The Cubans by their constitution guarantee a free church in a free state. They guarantee liberty of conscience. Those are things in which Americans believe, and the Cubans, whatever their faults or deficiencies may be, stand also for those principles.

Our immediate pecuniary interests in the island are very great. They are being destroyed. Free Cuba would mean a great market to the United States; it would mean an opportunity for American capital, invited there by signal exemptions; it would mean an opportunity for the development of that splendid island.

Cuba is but a quarter smaller than the island of Java, and the island of Java sustains 23,000,000 people. Cuba has a population of a million and a half, and she is one of the richest spots on the face of the earth. She has not grown or prospered, because the heavy hand of Spain has been upon her.

Those, Mr. President, are some of the more material interests involved in this question, but we have also a broader political interest in the fate of Cuba. The great island lies there across the Gulf of Mexico. She commands the Gulf, she commands the channel through which all our coastwise traffic between the Gulf and our Northern and Eastern States passes. She lies right athwart the line which leads to the Nicaragua Canal. Cuba in our hands or in friendly hands, in the hands of its own people, attached to us by ties of interest and gratitude, is a bulwark to the commerce, to the safety, and to the peace of the United States.

We should never suffer Cuba to pass from the hands of Spain to any other European power. We may dismiss that aspect of the subject. The question is whether we shall permit the present condition of affairs to continue. The island to-day is lost to Spain. They may maintain a guerilla warfare for years. They may wipe out every plantation and deluge the island in blood. I have here the proclamation of General Weyler. I have analyzed it paragraph by paragraph. No more bloody code was ever put forth. The life of every inhabitant in that island, peaceful or warlike, is placed at the disposition of the commander of the Spanish forces. Everyone who falls into his hands is absolutely at his mercy. He can condemn them to imprisonment or to death. They must all have passes, and they must get new ones, and if they fail to get them in eight days they are liable to go to prison or to the scaffold.

The people in the country are to be driven into towns where the Spanish troops are, under penalty, if they refuse, of being seized and conducted to prison and perhaps to death. All judicial authority is vested in the commanding general and his associates. The plan is a plan of desolation and extermination. Spain may have it in her power to prolong the agony until the island is a solitude, and she then may be able to call it peace. But, Mr. President, that is the only result.

Spain may ruin the island. She can never hold it or govern it again. Cuba now is not fighting merely for independence. Those men are fighting, every one of them, with a price on their heads and a rope around their necks. They have shown that they could fight well. They are now fighting the battle of despair. That is the condition to-day in that island. And here we stand motionless, a great and powerful country not six hours away from these scenes of useless bloodshed and destruction.

I have spoken of our material interests. I have referred to our political interests in the future of Cuba. But, Mr. President, I am prepared to put our duty on a higher ground than either of those, and that is the broad ground of a common humanity. No useful end is being served by the bloody struggle that is now in progress in Cuba, and in the name of humanity it should be stopped.

We have had a good deal to say in this Chamber and elsewhere about Armenia. We know very well that Armenia is far beyond our sphere of influence or of action. We know that, as a matter of traditional policy and as a physical matter of distance, we can not interfere in the affairs of Turkey or stay the massacre of her subjects. The words we utter on Armenia are mere words, the words of sympathy, and that is all. We can not support them by deeds. The slaughter in Armenia has been going on now for many months and has involved massacres which can not be equaled in extent unless you go back over three hundred years to the period of religious wars in Europe, and those wars shook the whole of Europe from the center to the circumference. To-day those massacres go on in Armenia, and the civilization of western Europe has stood by paralyzed and helpless. It has not been able to do one single thing to check it. With millions of armed men, with hundreds of great ships, it has stood by and allowed the Sultan to wreak his will on those helpless people. England, to whom Turkey owes her very existence as a nation among nations, has not stirred. The recent utterances of Lord Salisbury in regard to Armenia can only be described as pitiful. His words would have been impossible from an English prime minister in the time of Chatham, or of Canning, or of Palmerston.

But, Mr. President, Lord Salisbury obeys a stronger force, a mightier will, than his own. In the last resort, the power which controls in Europe and in England is the great power of money and of the money lender. The money lenders do not care how many Armenians are butchered; the Armenians are not nominated in the bond; but they care very much that nothing shall be done to disturb or jar anything, that nothing shall be done to disturb values; and they fear that if England moved to rescue the wretched Armenians values might be disturbed and Ottoman bonds decline. There is England with the greatest fleet of modern times, that great flying squadron, which she mobilizes with such wonderful speed. It has remained in the English Channel and furnished pictures for the illustrated newspapers. It has not been seen or heard in the sea where Blake and Nelson fought their battles, and yet England is more responsible than any other country for the existence of Turkey. To-day the world of western Europe and the world of America is looking to Russia, that country so recently emerged from barbarism, that country which is semi-Asiatic, to save those Armenians, and wipe out Turkey, that blot on modern civilization.

Now, Mr. President, we have right here an Armenian at our own doors. In Cuba there is useless bloodshed, brutality, cruelty, and destruction of life and property—all the horrors that can accompany a savage war which is not submitted to the rules of civilized warfare. Is our civilization in the United States to break down as the civilization of western Europe has broken down before Armenia? I do not believe it to be possible. Of the sympathies of the American people, generous, liberty loving, I have no question. They are with the Cubans in their struggle for freedom. I believe our people would welcome any action on the part of the United States to put an end to the terrible state of things existing there. We can stop it. We can stop it peacefully. We can stop it, in my judgment, by pursuing a proper diplomacy and offering our good offices. Let it once be understood that we mean to stop the horrible state of things in Cuba, and it will be stopped. The great power of the United States, if it is once invoked and uplifted, is capable of greater things than that.

Mr. President, we have a movement in favor of peace and arbitration recently set on foot by some distinguished and very wealthy and eminent citizens of the city of New York and other great cities of the country. They are influenced beyond any question by devotion to the divine principle of "peace on earth and good will to men." I can not suppose that for a moment they mean to confine their opposition to war merely to wars in which we are engaged. They must be opposed to all wars; and they are, I take it, but an expression of the general feeling of the American people that the mission of the great Republic is one of peace.

Therefore, Mr. President, here is a war with terrible characteristics flagrant at our very doors. We have the power to bring it to an end. I believe that the whole American people would welcome steps in that direction.

Recognition of belligerency as an expression of sympathy is all very well. I think it is fully justified by the facts in Cuba, but I should like to see some more positive action taken than that. I think we can not escape the responsibility which is so near to us. We can not shrug our shoulders and pass by on the other side. If that war goes on in Cuba, with the added horrors which this new general brings with him, the responsibility is on us; we can not escape it. We should exert every influence of the United States. Standing, as I believe the United States stands, for humanity and civilization, we should exercise every influence of our great country to put a stop to that war which is now raging in Cuba and give to that island once more peace, liberty, and independence. [Applause.]

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from Alabama will permit me, I wish to state that two Senators on the other side of the Chamber—one the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE]—expressed a desire to participate in this debate, and I, perhaps injudiciously, said that this matter would probably go over until to-morrow, and that it could not be finished to-night. I hope that that understanding will be had, so that no motion will be made to adjourn over until Monday, in the hope that to-morrow we may be able to dispose of the resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. I am quite content with that arrangement.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want Senators who have gone away to be misled by anything I have said.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, this is an occasion which requires from Congress and the President the utmost degree of deliberation and circumspection. Great events may hinge upon our action here, events of great magnitude, considered with reference to the national expenditures of money and lives in the possible occurrence of war.

In the opening of my remarks I wish to say that after a calm and almost a reluctant examination of this very serious situation, I believe the possibilities of a war with Spain growing out of our action ought to be discarded from our consideration, as affecting our action, because we shall not give to Spain any just cause of offense in anything that we may do, whether it is the recognition of the belligerency of Cuba or whether it is the recognition of the independence of that Republic. We can neither abate nor avoid nor run away from duties that are incumbent upon us by considering what impression they may make upon any other country, provided the motive of our action is such as is required and justified by the demands of our own country by its historical facts and the reminiscences, traditions, and sentiments of our people.

We have not heretofore occupied, nor do we now occupy, an inimical position toward the Government of Spain. I do not use the word hostile, because there is nothing approximating that thought in our present attitude or in our past history, except upon occasions when we have had cause of special complaint against her or she against us. We do not occupy now a position that is even inimical to Spain, and yet it must be admitted that Spanish monarchy is not a form of Government, or that it has ruled in its colonial possessions in Cuba, or elsewhere in South America, when it had sovereign powers on this hemisphere, in a way, that is agreeable to our people. We do not, of course, admit that the Spanish monarchy, in its rule of its colonies, had the approbation or the affectionate regard of the American people in the past, or that it is likely in the future to meet with the approbation of a Government like that of the United States, and of people such as we have. We have our own institutions, our own surroundings, our own destiny, and our own means of accomplishing that destiny under the providence of God, and our responsibility as a nation is to the Great Ruler of Events, and secondarily to the opinion of the other nations of the earth.

So, in the consideration of this question, I hope it will be perfectly understood that the Committee on Foreign Relations, whose resolution I have the honor to advocate at this moment, have not been animated in the slightest degree by any sense of wrong or injustice intentionally done by the Spanish Government to the Government of the United States now or heretofore. There is nothing in our action that partakes in the least degree of retaliation. Our action is controlled, as far as we are able to shape it, entirely, as I have remarked, by the consideration of what is due to our own Government and our own people under a very peculiar relation that we hold to the government and people of Cuba.

In the consideration of this question the Committee on Foreign Relations have found themselves able to separate themselves entirely from all considerations except those which I have indicated as the basis of our action. When this Congress met, petitions and memorials from different persons and communities, from societies and legislatures of the States, flooded in upon the Senate and upon the House. They reached the table of the Senate and were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations until they amounted to a great number.

The pressure of these various proceedings on the part of the people of the United States was very heavy upon both Houses and doubtless upon the Executive also. The Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, not desirous of repressing or resisting these demands from the people of the United States, have still felt that the gravity of the occasion required them to give a very careful investigation to the whole question as far as we were in the possession of means to understand it. I must confess that the information which we possess on that subject is not perhaps official. It is in a large sense accurate; in my opinion, it is altogether credible. Yet it has been gathered from various sources, an important part of it from certain persons delegated by the government of the republic of Cuba to visit the United States and to present to the Executive and to Congress a full statement of the actual situation in Cuba, both as to civil affairs and the military situation.

After patient examination of these various documents and comparing them with such information as we could gather from the statements in the public prints, to which credit was given by the press and the United States almost without dissent, the committee feel that they have reached a ground upon which they can stand firmly in presenting for the consideration of the Senate the action that is proposed in the resolution which has been presented to the Senate in behalf of the majority of that committee.

I think the demands of duty have been growing more serious upon the committee, as they have upon the Senate and upon the country, from day to day by a fuller and a better understanding of the actual situation as between Cuba and Spain. Surrounded as that island is by the Spanish navy and under the censorship exercised over all communications which have been permitted to come to the United States, it has only been occasionally that we have had the means of access to those private sources of information from which, after all, we can derive the truest view of the real situation in Cuba.

This embarrassment has retarded the committee in its action very properly; but we have not come before the Senate without being persuaded, fully persuaded, that we have quite sufficient information of an authentic and reliable character upon which to base the report that we have made.

Before going into the argument of that report I wish to make some statements in regard to the law upon this question. I would begin, Mr. President, by defining what is a state of belligerency when it is recognized by one government in favor of another, and what are the consequences of it. When any insurrection has grown to the magnitude of a public civil war and has so impressed itself upon other nations of the world as to convince them that they would be justified in recognizing the existence of a civil war it then becomes the privilege and, in the Christian sense and in the sense of modern international law, the duty of civilized governments to recognize the state of belligerency as existing.

No nation can proceed against its own people in such a way as to hold them amenable to the pains and penalties of felony or piracy or ignominious punishment after those people, animated by a desire for liberty, have concentrated their efforts in the assemblage of large masses for the purpose of achieving liberty and independence, and have so far been able to concentrate and organize their power as to present important armies in the field of military exploit, such armies organized regularly under military law, divided into corps and other subordinate divisions of an army, reaching down to the company organization, and controlled by supreme military authority, as the ruling power and law of these collections of armed men are capable of conducting war and are entitled to the recognition that is accorded to regular armies in the laws of nations. When these things have attained to that degree a man engaged in those ranks by enlistment changes his character from that of a felonious rebel or insurrectionist into the higher character of a soldier, and the civilized nations of the earth feel it incumbent upon them, in honor and in duty, to recognize that man as a soldier, entitled to the protection of the laws of civilized war. This is a direct purpose of the resolutions under discussion, and it has every sanction of justice and benevolence.

It must be remembered, Mr. President, that armies are composed, after all, not of officers alone, but of soldiery as well. They are led and commanded by officers, but the soldiers do the marching, bear the guns, do the fighting, fill the graves and the hospitals, and when they are captured fill the prisons.

It must also be remembered that governments de facto exist and are recognized the world over, and have been recognized for many ages, and that governments de facto, whether they are considered in the military or in the civil sense, while they have rule and supremacy in a certain area of country, have the right to demand the services of the people over whom they are instituted and to impose duties upon them to the extent of enlisting them in the armies, to the extent of taking their property for military purposes or Government purposes, and even to the extent of commanding their allegiance and their support; and that the civilized nations of the earth extend to people thus put under the dominion of de facto power the correlative right of protection in their persons and property, without being held liable criminally for their acts of obedience to that Government.

That is the same law, sir, that applies in civil and military establishments, and where any body of citizenship have collected together and armed and organized themselves into a military power, and they have dominion over a given area of country, the people who are within the influence of that dominion are justified, under the laws of nations everywhere, in rendering obedience and even support to that power. When a man enlists in an army thus constituted, which has the power of supreme authority in his vicinity, and he puts upon himself the insignia of a soldier, and takes his arms and makes his enlistment and swears his allegiance to the flag that is over him, as he can be compelled to do by a power that he can not resist, that man's character, in the eye of the laws of nations, changes from the private rebel or insurrectionist into that of a soldier, and he has the right to the protection that the laws of civilized warfare give to soldiery. The world has too much need of the services of the soldier to permit that service to subject him to the penalties of infamous punishment when he is captured in open war.

What is the consequence of the position I have just been attempting to discuss, if it be true? It is, of course, that a Cuban taken in arms, under the existing state of affairs in that island, is not amenable to trial and execution, we will say, by drum-head court-martial or by any summary proceeding, or any other proceeding. He can not be justly considered as being a felon—a man who has compromised his relations with his former Government to that extent that he is entitled only to bear the ignominy of a felonious conviction, with imprisonment for the remainder of his life, and his children doomed to follow him in wearing this stained garment of reputation.

This is the condition that Spain imposes upon native citizens who resist tyranny, in obedience to God, rather than endure it through fear of terrible personal sufferings. Driven to war by relentless oppression, the world is asked to deny them the rights that belong to armies in the field, because Spain chooses to denounce them as robbers.

If the Government of Spain could make up its mind to recognize the existence in Cuba of an insurrection, if they please to call it such, which has reached the proportions of a general civil war with organized armies, by that act they would place themselves in line with the opinion and conduct of other Christian powers and they would concede to the soldiery who might be in the Cuban army the rights of belligerency, just as was done during the period of the civil war in the United States. Neither party suffered from that course of civilized warfare. But Spain obstinately refuses to do this.

Is there any doubt, Mr. President, can there be any doubt, that the war in Cuba has attained to that magnitude in which it becomes the duty and the wisest policy of Spain to make this acknowledgment in behalf of the Cuban insurrectionists? There can be no doubt about it.

The President of the United States, in his last annual message to the Congress, describes this as a bloody war, a public war, no longer a mere insurrection, no longer a mob or an embroilment of citizens without organization, for the purpose of wreaking some revenge or for the purpose of displacing some officer who may be offensive to them in the civil or military government of Cuba; nothing of that kind. It is an open, public war, and the fact is so plain, so manifest, in the history of which we are perfectly cognizant, that the question does not admit of debate.

We, therefore, in the progress of our consideration of this question, can advance to that ground with absolute confidence that this is a public war, and that in this public war it is the duty of Spain to make a concession in favor of the other belligerents to the effect that the people who are engaged in that army by regular enlistment are soldiers and shall have the treatment of soldiers.

If Spain should do such a thing as that, Mr. President, that would be a recognition by the Sovereign of the belligerent rights of these people who are fighting against her flag and fighting for their independence; and in that view there would be no occasion, certainly no necessity, for the Government of the United States, or any other Government, to interfere for the purpose of securing to the soldiery in those armies the benefits, whatever they may be, of civilized warfare. Spain has not done this; Spain does not intend to do this. Spain fills to repletion her prison in Africa with persons captured out of the army of the rebels; she fills Morro Castle, Puerto Cabanos, and all other prisons of which she has the control with these victims caught from the other army, who are taken when caught, and by a summary process are condemned to life servitude in these terrible prisons, if, indeed, they are permitted to live.

If we are ever called in question for making a humane declaration in favor of these victims, we shall be, fortunately, supported by an array of facts that will call forth the sympathies of all Christendom. As the action we propose is based on justice and our regard for human rights, our sympathy for the oppressed needs not to be justified, at this time, by a recital of all their wrongs and sufferings.

Spain inflicts upon them penalties under the name of law which their crimes would not deserve, even if they were individuals engaged separate and apart, or in little squads, in insurrection against the Government of Spain; but being soldiers, and having enlisted in a place and at a time and under circumstances and for purposes which recommend them to the fair and favorable consideration of mankind, it becomes the duty of the civilized governments of the world, so far as they are able to effect or accomplish anything in that direction, to say to Spain: "We recognize the belligerent rights of the people under arms in that country who call themselves citizens of the Republic of Cuba."

I trust that I have brought out in this way, in rather simple form, the real ground upon which the United States and every other country has the right to intervene to the extent, at least, that this resolution proposes. It is in behalf of mercy; it is in behalf of justice; in this particular case it is in behalf of liberty, and, more than that, it is in behalf of the kind of liberty which we enjoy; it is in behalf of that kind of liberty where the people themselves furnish the governing power and where they dispute the right of monarchy to govern them at will and pleasure. So there is everything in the situation of the case which is attractive to the American people to induce us to occupy that ground which is justified, not merely by our predilections or our sympathies, but that ground which is justified by the laws of warfare; modern, civilized war, as it is described in the books on international law.

I therefore assume, Mr. President, without stopping to debate it particularly, that the Government of the United States has the right, and that it is our duty, and that it accords with our sentiments, and that it justly stirs the blood in our veins when we make this declaration and say to Spain: "You have long enough lacerated these people in your efforts to destroy them under the plea of quelling insurrection. Now they are entitled to belligerent rights, and we intend, so far as we are concerned, to give them that recognition by expressing our opinion here that they are so entitled; and when we have made that recognition we intend to be bound hereafter, just as we have been in the past, by our own laws and also by the laws of the nations of the earth—the international law—to maintain perfect neutrality between these recognized belligerents, doing no favor to either that is not permitted by the laws of war, by international law, and denying to neither of them the privileges which they have the right to enjoy as belligerent powers." That is our attitude.

I now come back to the first proposition with which I started out: Can Spain rightfully assume that in our taking that course on an occasion like this, there is any menace against her or any act which is inimical to her dignity and power, her jurisdiction, or her sovereignty? No; and if she desires to take offense where none is intended, and none is really given, all that we can say is, "You will have to take offense; but we had rather that you would take offense at our attitude as a Government than that the God of nations and the human family should take offense at our silence and our indifference in the presence of this wrong. We have got to choose an attitude here which you have forced upon us by your misgovernment in Cuba, or otherwise we shall not take that position which is becoming to a great Republic and an honest, upright, and courageous people; and, having taken that attitude without enmity toward you, if you choose to embroil us on that account, why, simply we can not help it. You embroil us, if you ever do so, because we do our plain duty, and no more.

We must determine for ourselves whether it is just that we should accord, on our part, and under our laws, the rights of civilized warfare to a great body of people in Cuba who have resisted the whole power of Spain for more than a year and increase in numbers and military strength with every day that passes.

I now come to the consideration of what would be our position when we recognize the belligerency of the Cuban Republic, for that is what I style it, that is what they style it themselves, and I think, before I get through with my argument, I shall show that they have ample reason for calling themselves, with proud satisfaction, the Republic of Cuba, for, if it be not now a republic in full development and in the majesty of power which it seems destined to enjoy some day, it may be another Moses in his basket among the bullrushes, and after a while it will come to light, and the world will rejoice in the presence of that new republic.

We have a number of remarkably stringent statutes upon our statute book for the protection of other countries surrounding us, by enforcing upon our people the doctrines of international law, which are called neutrality. One who reads our statute book and compares it with that of almost any other country in the world, I think, will be surprised at the stringency with which we guard against the interference of our people in any war which may take place in any country foreign to us. We have had on both sides of us nations which we have been compelled to protect by these statutes—Canada on the north, Mexico on the southwest, and more particularly Cuba on the south. This code of laws, strong and urgent and stringent as it is, was never suggested to the Congress of the United States by the enmity of our people toward any other nation in the world.

It is not our inherent trouble, it is not the drift of our people in the direction of maraud and robbery and interference with foreign Governments which has caused this legislation to be placed upon the statute book. We have a conservative people, a law-abiding, lawmaking, law-loving people; and when you place a question of foreign relations or foreign troubles or difficulties before the mind of an American you always find him looking at it with cool circumspection, ready to participate when duty demands it, but not ready to participate as a mere filibusterer or as a mere aggressor upon the rights of foreign people. That is not a characteristic of our people that these statutes were put upon the statute book to hold in check or to correct. If we had been as insular as Great Britain, we should have needed none of those statutes with which to control our people. These laws have been put upon our statute book for the protection of our neighbors.

It has been, I think, only on one occasion, or perhaps two, that we have had any necessity for resorting to them in reference to our relations with Canada. We have had more frequent necessity to appeal to those laws in our relations with Mexico, but a still more frequent and still more painful necessity of appealing to them with reference to our relations with Cuba. This graduation of the necessity we have been under of applying those laws is a sufficient indication of our appreciation and that of our people at large of the characteristics of those Governments.

People who conduct good government have the friendship of the American people, while those who rule tyrannically incur their displeasure.

Canada is self-governing; she has a race of people very much like ourselves, very close akin to us. Mexico differs from Canada in that respect; and in consequence of some misfortunes, which crept into her constitution, and which she has only recently gotten rid of, Mexico has been so often in such a state of turbulence that it was necessary that the Government of the United States should exercise extraordinary supervision over her own people to keep them from going down there and participating in the insurrections and rebellions which have so often occurred.

When we get to Cuba, Mr. President, an island which is accessible only by the sea, guarded by a great monarchy, our people, when they have invaded, or attempted to invade that island, have not gone there for the purpose of robbery. They have not gone there because they wanted to impose our institutions upon Cuba. Very few Americans, indeed, even the wildest of them, and in the most exaggerated condition of what I might call their covetousness of power and wealth, have ever thought about going to Cuba for the purpose of acquiring it and annexing it to the United States. While our people desire the independence of Cuba, very few of them desire its annexation.

Why is it, then, that we have had to keep these laws on the statute book, and that every time an outbreak has occurred in Cuba the first thing which has been done by the President of the United States was to issue a most radical proclamation, warning our people and forbidding them in the strongest possible manner from going into the Island of Cuba and from violating our laws intended to prevent them from doing so. What has caused this? It has been, on every occasion, some wrong done by Spain to the Cuban people, the recognition of which we could not shut out from our own consciences and our own hearts. We have stood here as a guard, as a picket post, as an outline of defense of the Monarchy of Spain through the medium of these laws and the proclamations of Presidents of the United States for very nearly a century, during which period of time five great insurrections or revolts have occurred in Cuba.

What has it cost us thus to guard a people whose resentments have been so justly excited, but are reluctant to interfere with foreigners or with foreign Governments? What has it cost us to keep in check and hold down the Cuban refugees who have come to the United States from time to time, driven out of the islands by the stress of persecution? Think of the lives of American citizens that have been sacrificed; think of the men who have been leaned up against adobe walls before sunrise in the morning and shot to death by Spain because, following their sympathies, they felt that they could go to Cuba and give a helping hand to their relatives, their own blood kindred, in the Island of Cuba, who went there, as Lopez did, for the purpose of relieving his own relatives from these barbarities.

What has it cost us? In money, Mr. President, a very large sum; in blood, a very great treasure; in anguish of feeling, an unutterable thing; in national distress, great discomfort; in our commercial relations with Cuba, and even with other parts of the earth, immense losses; in the honor of our flag, frequent searches and visitations, outrageous wrong, which we have put up with for the time being rather than to resent, because we preferred peace to war, although there might have been an occasion when we should have been entirely justified in going to war. That is what it has cost us; that is what it is costing us now. The record of our losses and of our sufferings and of our wrongs, wrongs to our own people which have been inflicted upon them through the cruelties of Spanish dominion in Cuba, is a record which, if it were written up consecutively, would astonish the world.

Mr. President, if the Island of Cuba were as close to Great Britain as it is to the United States and the same wrongs had been done there that have been perpetrated against our neighbor, who can fail to understand what would have been the fate of Cuba? Great Britain would have absorbed her a century ago or more. She would have said to herself as she has said in respect to Ireland, but with extreme injustice with regard to Ireland, "You have a rich country that we need; you have a people who are incapable of self-government, refractory, turbulent, and rebellious, and the best thing that Great Britain can do is to take you into the Kingdom and govern you, discrown your king, hang your martyrs, break down your constitution and the traditions of the past, and take you into our lordly bosom." If Cuba had occupied the geographical relation to Great Britain, France, or Germany that she occupies to the United States, long ago she would have disappeared from the list of Spanish colonies, and she would have belonged to some great ruling, energetic, Christian power.

Mr. GRAY. Does the Senator from Alabama like our policy better?

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Delaware asks me if I like our policy better. I like it better, provided that our temporizing is not to be protracted until Cuba is destroyed and until our self-respect is gone. I think there is a moment of time—perhaps that moment has arrived—when we have to determine that question for ourselves. Perhaps the moment now is when the American people ought to say to themselves: "It is high time that those people in Cuba had a government under which they could at least exist."

Now, our attitude toward Cuba and toward Spain has been one entirely innocent. It has been forbearing; it has been just and upright, and there is no ground for accusation against us. The only ground of accusation that exists in regard to our attitude toward Spain and Cuba is that we have forborne to do perhaps in the past what we should have done, to the great wrong of the people of Cuba and particularly to that large and respectable class of people who have been driven by those revolutions into the United States seeking hospitality.

I wish to speak a moment about those people who have come to the United States under the invitation of this Government upon its doctrines of expatriation and of naturalization. They have in good faith united in our citizenship; they have adopted our flag as the flag of their country; they have sworn allegiance to the Constitution of our country, and when war has prevailed here, or the exigencies of the Government have demanded any other great sacrifice, they have come along as willingly as any of us, and have contributed to the power and the honor and the glory of the United States. As citizens in time of peace the Cubans, who, perhaps, mostly reside in the larger cities of the United States, have been citizens of eminent respectability and propriety of conduct.

I do not remember any Cuban who has been called to account in the courts of the United States or elsewhere for disloyalty to the Government of this country. They are not to be accounted among the rabble or the outcasts of society. Many of them have transferred their property to this country, what remnant of it was left, and have started in upon business engagements here of an honorable character. Many of them have left behind the titles that they wore under the Spanish Monarchy and in Cuba, and have cheerfully abandoned the distinctions which made them prominent among their own class of people in order to accept the plain equality of the democracy and the republicanism of the United States. They have come in great numbers, and not one of them has set his foot upon these shores who has not had extended to him a hand of welcome and a heart beating with cordial regard, for this is the land of the persecuted refugee. It is a land to which all the oppressed of the earth may come with perfect assurance that when they have planted their feet upon our soil they have got home to the land of liberty.

These people have come in great numbers. Some of the most eminent men, not politically, but in science and in business and in law, are found among the Cuban circles who have been driven out of Cuba and who have taken refuge in the United States. I have great respect for them. Martin Kozsta had no firmer hold upon the heart of Daniel Webster than a man like Menocal has upon my heart to-day. When those people have ventured to go back to their own country occasionally they have been subjected to violence and imprisonment and confiscation and the like by the Spanish Government out of a spirit of mere anger, resentment, and retaliation. That is not among the least of the evils that we have had to put up with or overlook on behalf of the Cubans who have been here.

To-day Spain has more animosity toward us on their account than on account of everything else. These men can traverse this country from one end to another; they can raise money for the relief of the people of Cuba; they can send it to them. They can discuss the situation in Cuba with perfect freedom. They can discuss and understand the restrictions of our laws upon them and render cheerful and perfect obedience them. But the Spanish Government regards the liberty that we have accorded to them in holding their meetings and conventicles and in passing their resolutions or adopting their programmes in behalf of the people of Cuba as an offense that is intolerable to the mind and heart of a Spanish ruler. For that reason they, of course, grow more and more angry toward us continually, and that is the true ground of the opposition of Spain to the United States.

Spain would be the best friend to us that we have in the world if whenever a Cuban refugee undertakes to land in one of our ports we should drive him back to the sea and tell him to seek a home elsewhere. But we open our doors to him; he comes in here, and when he gets here he comes, it is true, as an enemy of Spain, but Spain becomes our enemy because we tolerate in our midst somebody who does not happen to like her. That is the situation. We give no encouragement to any ill feeling toward Spain, but accord to our citizens, native or adopted, the right to love Spain or to abhor her according to their free will. Justice, as it is enforced by public opinion, will temper such feelings, but force can not crush them out.

Now, Mr. President, these laws to which I have referred, after we have passed the concurrent resolution, will remain precisely what they are now. They will not be changed in the least, nor will any other law of the United States be changed, although there will be a new application of some of the international laws to a situation created by this act of recognition. That is all. The laws will not be changed anywhere, but a new application of them will thus be made.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. Does the Senator understand that the passage of the pending concurrent resolution by the two Houses without its sanction by the President amounts to anything? Does he understand that it amounts to a recognition of belligerent rights?

Mr. MORGAN. I think it does, if the concurrent resolution is adopted. I do not deny the delicacy of that question, nor do I deny the fact that we have never settled it by a statute in the United States. That question is left open simply as a constitutional question, and the measure of the rights of Congress and of the President of the United States in respect to it is found only in the Constitution. What the proper interpretation of that instrument is as bearing upon the particular right or matter that the Senator from Connecticut suggests is something not really necessary in this debate, because the form of the resolution is not such as to evoke the question.

Nevertheless, if it becomes necessary, or if the Senate of the United States desires to pass a resolution of the actual recognition of the independence of Cuba on this occasion, then we would have to give consideration necessarily to the question whether a recognition by a concurrent vote of the two Houses would be a full recognition or whether the President of the United States must participate in the act before it becomes a full recognition.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator from Alabama have any doubt that the passage of such a resolution as he has indicated, recognizing the independence of this assumed republic, would result immediately in a suspension of friendly diplomatic relations, the withdrawal of the Spanish minister, with the near probability of being involved in hostilities? Does not the Senator think that such a resolution would be a distinctive act in the direction of a probable war?

Mr. MORGAN. I remarked in the opening of my speech that this question had grown upon us, that we had approached it, I confessed I approached it, reluctantly because of its magnitude, because of the ultimate consequences that might follow it, and I think I will take the liberty of saying to the Senate what I said to the Committee on Foreign Relations on that question when this matter came up.

Mr. HALE. I am sure we will be glad to hear the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. Here was a great mass of petitions and memorials to which we had to make some answer. We had to report them back adversely and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the question, or else we had to do something in the direction at least of the recognition of the belligerent rights of the Cubans. How far we should go was, of course, a matter left for after consideration.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Alabama has yielded to other Senators, and I should like to ask him a practical question. Suppose the pending resolution is passed by the concurrent action of the two Houses, not going to the President, what right or duty appertains to an American citizen after its passage which does not appertain to an American citizen before its passage, and what right belongs to a Cuban insurgent after its passage that he did not possess before?

Mr. MORGAN. It is a part of my duty, before I can lay this matter properly before the Senate, although it may require some prolixity of speech to do so, to take up the question suggested by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and also the one suggested by the honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PLATT. I do not think I made myself exactly clear. The question which I wish to have answered is, whether the passage of this resolution by the two Houses of Congress, without the action of the Executive, amounts to according to the insurgents or patriots, as they may be called, in Cuba belligerent rights?

Mr. MORGAN. That will depend on the wording of the resolution. The question put to me by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] involves the very consideration of the question whether——

Mr. PLATT. If I may be permitted still further, we understand that when the President, under such circumstances, issues a proclamation of neutrality, which is the ordinary form in which belligerent rights are accorded, certain rights attach to the people who are struggling, and certain obligations attach to the United States.

Now, what I wish to know is, whether those same rights attach to the Cuban people and the same obligations attach to the people of the United States and the Government of the United States upon the passage of this resolution just as if it were an Executive act, performed by the President.

Mr. MORGAN. I can not leave the floor without answering, if I am able to do so, the questions propounded by each of the honorable Senators.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the Senator from Florida will let me go on without further interruption, inasmuch as I have before me a large field of questions to answer.

Mr. FRYE. I hope the Senator from Alabama will preserve the distinction between the question asked by my colleague and the one asked by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. MORGAN. The question propounded to me by the colleague of the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] is the one I propose to answer first. I was proceeding to do so by a statement of the attitude which I held on this question when it was first presented to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

When the petitions had to be considered and had to be reported adversely, with a request that we might be discharged from their further consideration, or else we had to take the other side of the question and find that we could and should pass a resolution in some form recognizing belligerency in Cuba, I said to the Committee on Foreign Relations: "I contemplate war at the end of any resolution that we pass in that direction, not that it would be just, not that there would be the slightest excuse for it, but because Spain is in such a condition, her animosities against us are so excited, her jealousy and her pride are so extreme, and I will add also absolutely inexcusable in the light of reason, that I feel that it makes no difference what steps we take, Spain will make it the occasion of belligerent action toward us." I therefore accepted the situation, whenever I took a step in that direction—it made no difference how long or how short it was—that it would ultimately result in war.

I said then, and I repeat, that I believe Spain to-day would be under obligations to us for giving her a cause of war in regard to Cuba. Why? Because Spain knows just as well as the rest of mankind knows that the fetters with which she has bound Cuba since Columbus made the discovery of it, and particularly in the last century or century and a half, have corroded until they are rusting off the limbs of those people. They have got to be inconvenient in the respect of the civilized world.

To give an illustration of it I will say there was a certain sort of shackle in use at the time when Christopher Columbus was occupying the Spanish provinces that he discovered here. The shackles were particularly heavy, and were worn upon the limbs of Spaniards when they were in durance under the law, military or civil. A very eminent Spanish artist painted Columbus as he was wearing those shackles when he was being taken from the Island of Cuba back to Spain to answer for imaginary offenses. He was taken back a prisoner upon a Spanish ship to answer at the Spanish court for supposed offenses against the Crown of Spain. The shackles were painted there.

That picture was brought here to be exhibited at the World's Fair in Chicago, and the men who controlled the exhibitions from the Government of Spain refused to let the picture go on exhibition unless the artist would paint out the shackles. Why? Because it was an evidence of what barbarism existed in Spain at the time when Columbus was taken and put on that ship. He painted them out. The picture went back to Cuba, and the friends of this artist rose upon him and denounced him for his cowardice. He admitted it, but said: "Who is not a coward who stands in front of the Monarch of Spain? Give me a brush and I will paint them back." And he did, and there they are now, but they are only in paint.

Now, the very shackles that Spain has laid upon the limbs of the Cubans have become disreputable even in the contemplation of Spain herself, but her pride causes her to hold this poor slave by the throat. She can not consent, with her imperious and monarchic ideas, to lift her bloody hands from the neck of this victim and accord to that poor slave the rights of man, sanctified in the name of constitutional liberty. She can not afford to do it, and she is not going to do it, and yet she can not hold Cuba. If this revolution does not free the Cubans from the grasp of Spain the next one will, or the next.

The revolutions have gone on now during all of this century, increasing in proportions and in power, each one making a step further in the direction of this happy release. There will be one more if this does not succeed, or one more if that does not succeed, and Cuba will come forward, amidst the paeans of the nations, free, sovereign, and independent. Spain knows it. Spain feels it. She is bound to recognize it. She would rather lose Cuba at the point of the sword when in conflict with the United States than to have us pay for it or to have those Cubans achieve their independence. She would thank us to take it off her hands with the point of the sword.

That is the reason why I say I have believed that any step in this direction would only anticipate the results that are bound to come in a very short time when Spain will find herself dismantled of her colonial strength on the American Hemisphere, as she has heretofore been by the combination of the great republics from Mexico to Patagonia from 1810 to 1830.

Spain has had no real, legitimate right to hold the province of Cuba and deny to her a voice in her own government after Mexico and Venezuela and Colombia and the South and Central American States were free. If Cuba had been occupied by people who in their hearts were as free and as strong as the people of Mexico, or the Central Americans, or the people of Colombia, or the Venezuelans were at the time they declared their independence, it is impossible to conceive that Cuba would have remained in the clutches of Spain. Why did she not? It was because at the time the revolutions took place in the other countries around Cuba she was dominated by a very few men who had their large plantations filled with slaves. She had no free population and none that were capable of aspiring to liberty at that time.

Mexico, when she achieved her independence, and every State down to the Antarctic Ocean, declared in their original constitutions, and held to their declaration irrevocably, that slavery should never exist in those countries. All declared it. Cuba could not make that declaration. She did not have the people. Her population were not up to the idea because the vast mass of her people then were slaves, else at the time these other Republics escaped from bondage to Spain Cuba would have released herself.

Now the situation is different. Now the slaves have been emancipated. The ten years' war of which we have been speaking here to-day was chiefly for the emancipation of those slaves. The very men emancipated at the end of that war have become soldiers in the Cuban army. They are fighting for higher liberties and to increase the standard of that liberty so that it shall amount to the right of self-government. That is the situation.

Therefore I hope the Senator from Maine will understand that in all I have done about this Cuban imbroglio I have acted with great reluctance. I have acted with the reluctance of a man who with his associates is compelled to take a very important position, what under ordinary circumstances might be called a very hazardous position, in the contemplation of actual war, without giving any just cause of offense to Spain. I have acted in full view of the fact that at the beginning of this controversy it was our business to discount the future, and to draw our sword and lay it upon the table and say to Spain, "If you want to take it up, take it up."

Mr. President, I think it is incumbent upon me as the Senator in charge of this measure on behalf of the committee to enter somewhat more fully than I have been able to do this afternoon upon a consideration of the facts, particularly those that relate to the organization of the Republic of Cuba and the progress of the war. I feel that I am scarcely able—I have had a very hard day's work—to complete this task this evening.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator is going to yield the floor for to-day——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACON in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. MORGAN. I am perfectly willing to yield for to-day.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator is desirous to continue another day, as he has intimated, I should like to call his attention to what I had in mind when I put him the question before. No man can read the story of a Spanish war against anybody without having his whole nature stirred by the emotions which were so eloquently uttered by my colleague. No American, no decent man on the face of the earth can help that feeling. But after all, when the Congress of the United States is to do something on such a matter with such consequences as the Senator conceives, we ought to do it with a full comprehension of what we are about, and we look to the great committee of which that eminent Senator was so long chairman, and of which he is now so influential a member to instruct us practically and exactly in what we are doing.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] in his very quiet speech (but into which a great deal of meaning was crowded in a very few sentences) said that this declaration, supposing it takes effect, according belligerent rights to the Cubans, is to have two effects, and two only. One is that it gives Spain belligerent rights at sea, so that not merely being at war in putting down a rebellion that is a little too strong for the constable, but being at war with another power which we have admitted is an equal power to her in the rights of war, she may search our ships under the right of a belligerent, under certain circumstances, at sea. Of course such a right would also belong to the Cubans, but they have not got any ships and it is valueless to them. Next, as I understood the Senator from Pennsylvania, he said the further effect is to release Spain from any obligation for injuries caused to the very large property of the numerous American citizens in Cuba.

Mr. MORGAN. After the declaration.

Mr. HOAR. After the declaration. The Cuban belligerents can not pay for such injuries if they inflict them, and they never would be expected to do it hereafter if they gained their independence.

Mr. TELLER. The Cubans are as able to do so as Spain.

Mr. HOAR. Whether they are as able as Spain or not is another question. So she is released, because this happened to our citizens in a war and not by acts of lawlessness in a country with whom we are at peace. Now, those two things the Senator from Pennsylvania——

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I wish the Senator from Colorado would pardon me.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. HOAR. No; I do not want to answer a question; I want to put one.

Mr. TELLER. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Pennsylvania said with great force that those are the two things which are to come from a recognition of belligerency. Now, is there anything else which is to come from it?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; one very important matter.

Mr. HOAR. Is there anything which is going to do those Cubans, those insurrectionists, any good? I do not speak now of an expression of good will, but I speak of the practical result. What help is it to be?

In the next place, the other question which has arisen in my mind—and it has also occurred to several other Senators—is, what is the effect on the obligations, duties, or rights of an American citizen, or on the obligations, duties, or rights of a Cuban insurrectionist of a recognition of belligerency by two Houses of Congress not signed or agreed to by the President of the United States?

In putting these questions I am not expressing my own opinion. I put them as a learner, and I put them with a very earnest desire to agree with the Senator from Alabama and those of his colleagues who have spoken on this subject. I wanted to call the attention of the Senator from Alabama to them now, so that when he goes on, if he thinks they are worth dealing with he may do so. They are things that are, in my mind at least, points for instruction.

Mr. MORGAN. I will interpose a very brief answer.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Allow me to answer the one put to me by the Senator from Massachusetts, and then I will hear the Senator's.

Mr. TELLER. In this connection I wanted the Senator from Massachusetts to add the further question whether the recognition on our part of belligerent rights changes the obligations of Spain with reference to, say, our own people who may be there. Is it not a question of fact to be determined, whether it is flagrant war or not?

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator from Alabama——

Mr. MORGAN. I can not afford to yield to the Senator from Florida—I am something more than a mere target for interrogatories.

Mr. CALL. In this connection I think the Senator from Alabama would like to read what I have in my hand here.

Mr. MORGAN. I have my own answer, which I will undertake to give in a very few words, with a view of elaborating it when I next take the floor; but I want now to present my answer in a few words to the Senator from Massachusetts, which he has courteously asked me for.

The last question asked by the Senator from Massachusetts he will find answered in the form and language of the resolution which we have reported. It is fully answered in the form and language of the resolution of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

As to the preceding question, as to the right of search, I will state that the right of search exists on the part of any country that is engaged in open war with an adversary. If the Spanish Government found that an American ship was destined for a Cuban port, it would have the right, outside of the 3-mile limit, to make a certain search of that ship.

Mr. HOAR. In case of war?

Mr. MORGAN. In case of a recognition of belligerency, as if they were at war. Now, what would that search be? It would be controlled by two things. Spain would have a responsibility about that search; she must make no mistake about it; just as a private man can not arrest another one for felony, and if he is mistaken about it he can not escape damages. There is more than that about it. We have got our own statutes here for the protection of our customs. We send ships out by our statutes 12 miles to sea to examine and search ships that are destined for ports in the United States, and that is considered to be not only a civil remedy, but a very excellent one, for protection against smuggling. Spain would have the belligerent right, under the laws of nations, to send her ships out and search our ships or any ships destined to Cuban ports, if you please, and see whether they were carrying contraband of war. If they are found not to be carrying contraband of war they are not amenable to arrest, yet the search may be rightful under the laws of war.

Now, another element comes in there which I beg to call to the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts, and that is the reason why I am making these remarks now, for I want to call that Senator's attention to our treaty relations with Spain. Under the treaty of 1795, a general treaty of commerce which is now in full force in the particular to which I am alluding, there is a restriction put upon her right of search of our ships in time of war. It does not make any difference who the war is with, whether with one of her own provinces or some foreign country. What is that restriction? It is that she shall not approach an American ship nearer than within gunshot, and there she shall stop and call the American ship to stop and send a boat out with not more than a definite number of persons—I think it is three or four—to examine the cargo of that ship to see whether or not there is anything contraband upon it.

Now, that treaty obligation remains, our treaty obligations with Spain remain, notwithstanding we may recognize the belligerency of the Cubans. That same treaty of 1795 outrode her recognition of the Confederate States and is still valid. It had no impression on it. So there it stands and regulates, so far as Spain is concerned, as between her and the United States, her right of search. That is now the limitation which is placed upon it by the treaty as well as by the international law, and that, I think, is an answer to the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, I am afraid I did not quite make my question clear. My question was not whether the right of search was a severe, onerous one or not. My question was whether the recognition of belligerency did not give it to Spain, whatever it was, and she did not have it without——

Mr. MORGAN. It certainly has not.

Mr. HOAR. And what else it gave to anybody. That is, what is there, except the sentimental side of it, by which a recognition of belligerency operates, except to give two things to Spain? One is the right of search, which she had not before, and the other the exemption from the obligation for her mischief done on the Island of Cuba to our citizens' property, which she might, as the Senator from Colorado well suggests, be responsible for in a clear case of flagrant war.

Mr. TELLER. She might escape responsibility.

Mr. HOAR. She might escape responsibility. In other words, if we go to Spain and say, "Mr. Atkins's sugar plantation, worth $250,000 or $1,000,000, was destroyed in the Island of Cuba, and your police and authorities did not protect it as you should; now pay up," Spain would have the right to say, "You have admitted yourself a condition of things which exonerated me from any obligation to protect that property"; while, if we do not declare the belligerency, it is a question of fact to be inquired into hereafter.

Mr. TELLER. She would have to prove it.

Mr. HOAR. She would have to prove it. What I want to know is not the extent of these two rights—I think we all probably understand those—but whether there is anything else under the sun that this resolution is operative to produce, supposing it to be binding on the Government of the United States without the assent of the President. That is my question.

Mr. MORGAN. There is one thing: At the present time, while that island is held by Spain to be in insurrection, she can prohibit the entry of our vessels into the island, and she can punish our people if she finds them there trading with these belligerents, and the laws of the United States would prohibit our people from trafficking with the people of Cuba in articles of contraband. We make the declaration of neutrality, and our people using these articles as merchandise and for mercantile purposes, powder, shot, cannons, wagons, or what not, would have the perfect right to leave our shores and proceed to Cuba and trade with the Cuban rebels if they can escape the blockade and escape detection, and Spain could not do anything with them. Spain could not arrest our people after they had gone in there and sold the product, whatever it might be.

In other words, the declaration of neutrality between these two powers, or assumed powers, would give to the people of the United States the free right of traffic, subject only to be caught by Spain. That is a very great advantage. It is not an advantage that I would give to the rebels in Cuba at all if they were a mere set of insurrectionists and the question was how much money we could make out of them, but it is an advantage which when moved by my sympathies I would not withhold from them.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator is very kind; but if he will permit me once more, it seems to me that the question I asked goes deeper than all these questions as to what the rights of the parties would be after belligerency. It is whether the passage of this resolution in itself amounts to according belligerent rights. If it is a mere resolution of sympathy, we might do that by saying that the two Houses of Congress sympathize with the Cuban patriots in their efforts to establish the independence of Cuba. Now, if it means only that, it is one thing. If it means that we, the two Houses of Congress, can by this action, in fact, recognize on the part of the Government of the United States the belligerency of those parties, then it is a very much more serious thing.

Mr. MORGAN. I will refer the Senator again to the language of this resolution, which has been very carefully drawn. If he will refer to that language I think he will discover that the action of the House and Senate, if the resolution shall be adopted just as it is, amounts to an absolute and irrevocable declaration in favor of belligerency and neutrality, and in favor of the Republic of Cuba.

Mr. PLATT. Then the question arises whether the two Houses can do that?

Mr. MORGAN. Then that would be a question as to whether the two Houses in passing a bill have the right to instruct the President of the United States as the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy to see that its will in regard to war is executed, and that would throw it back to where I suggested when I first set out—to a question which, not being regulated by statute, as it ought to be regulated by statute, is a question which must look for its solution alone to the Constitution of the United States; and there is no other source of law or power and no regulator in that case except the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to say that I think there is, to say the least, very great doubt as to whether the action of the two Houses alone can change in any sense our relation with other countries.

Mr. MORGAN. Perhaps the Senator from Connecticut will be prepared to admit that there is still greater doubt as to whether the action of the President of the United States, Congress being in session, can change the relation of the people of the United States to Spain. There might be still greater doubt. It is a question, after all, that has to be settled, I will remark again, by a proper consideration of the bearing of the Constitution of the United States upon it; and there is no other law that controls it.

Mr. FRYE. What is the Senator's own opinion?

Mr. MORGAN. My opinion is that Congress has the perfect, independent, absolute right to make this recognition of belligerency or a declaration of independence, and if it is necessary to enforce it by any military movement at sea or on land, it has the right to command the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy to go on the field if it is necessary and in person to see to the execution of that order. That is my opinion. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The occupants of the galleries must preserve order.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not understand, after the Congress of the United States declares that war exists between this country and Spain, for instance, that the President of the United States by vetoing that declaration can make it peace.

Mr. PLATT. There is no doubt but that Congress can declare war. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. MORGAN. If it can, then there is great doubt whether the President, by vetoing that declaration, can make it peace. It is either peace or war, the one or the other. But I never have thought that the Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States could refuse to go into the field and lead the armies because he did not want to fight, if we ordered him to do it. I never have thought that. This resolution, however, is in such form that if it is passed, the President of the United States will be required to communicate to these two Governments, and then the subsequent question may possibly concern us no more. I do not know.

Mr. PLATT. But this is not a declaration of war.

Mr. MORGAN. No; it is not a declaration of war. There is no war in it.

Mr. PLATT. It is a declaration that war exists somewhere else.

Mr. MORGAN. That is right; and all that Congress can do is to declare that war exists. Congress can not make war by joint resolution, nor can Congress and the President make war by joint resolution. War is first of all a legal situation; secondly, it is belligerency. It divides itself into two separate and distinct parts. One gives an attitude to the people and Government of the United States, and the other gives an attitude to the Army of the United States.

When Congress is said in the Constitution to have the power or the right to declare war, it means that Congress has the right to put the people of the United States and its Government in the attitude of war, and to make the laws of war applicable to this people. That is what it means. But a declaration of war, broadly considered or narrowly considered, when it is announced by the Congress of the United States, is the declaration of an existing status; that is all. We do not create it; we declare its existence. Now, if Congress can declare war and declare that it exists in the United States, it can declare it exists anywhere else, and the relations of this Government toward that foreign country where war exists must be governed by the laws of nations as they apply to war. That is the whole matter as I understand it. Our declaration does not create a war, does not create belligerency; it merely recognizes a certain condition which we decide to be a condition of war.

More than that, it would be very improper for the Senate of the United States to consider this question in the light of its being a war measure, in any other sense than as merely giving us an opportunity for determining what are our own powers as compared or contrasted with those of the President, for the reason that there is nothing done in this resolution, nor will anything be done in a declaration of the independence of Cuba, if such a resolution should pass, that has in it one breath of war. When the independence of the United States was recognized by Holland and by Belgium and by France in the revolutionary times, that was not considered an act of war, nor did that declaration make any of those governments an ally of the United States. France went further. She declared our independence and made herself an ally by assisting us.

France came into our war by an act of her own and in the contribution of ships and soldiers and money; but these other governments, recognizing our independence quite as fully as France had done, committed no act of hostility toward anybody by the declaration, nor do we. We did not get into a war with Spain when we recognized the independence of Mexico or any of the South American States. There was no partisanship on our part at all, no inclination toward partisanship or an affiliation or an alliance with them, but an act of simple right on our part, prompted by motives which were honorable to our country and designed for purposes which were countenanced in international law.

I am now ready, Mr. President, to yield to an adjournment.

Mr. CALL. I desire to have inserted in the RECORD the interpretation and construction which the Government of Spain places upon the according of belligerent rights to the Cuban government, which is very important.

Mr. GEORGE. Have it read.

Mr. CALL. I will read it. It is a translation from inclosure No. 2611 in the correspondence of the Department of State transmitted to the House of Representatives by the President:

[Remarks of Mr. Canovas.]

The following extracts from an interview held by one of the editors of the Heraldo, of Madrid, with the head of the Government are worthy of being known:

INTERNATIONAL LAW.

In our country, Mr. Canovas remarked to us, there is but little attention given to the study of international questions.

International law springs from the mutual convenience of nations, and there being no code or tribunal for the submission of international questions, there remains no other remedy for their settlement between governments than the guidance offered by already established precedents.

It was because of this, on settling the affair of the Allianca, the pamphlet of Mr. Castro was ordered to be published, in which all the opinions of the most eminent publicists are recapitulated. From those opinions a perfectly clear and exact theory was obtained for the treatment of this question. If there is anything to the contrary, then let it be explained.

After much discussion and the exposition of all kinds of opinions, the question was at last reduced to possible and rational terms.

On the Heraldo saying that the moment has arrived to consider if it would be better to maintain the actual state of things or recognize the belligerency of the insurrection in Cuba, so as to apply all the rights of war, it thereon presents a question that perhaps has occurred more than once to my mind. The Government has no need to vacillate in this, since the country does not vacillate. The Cuban insurgents are nothing more than rebel and robber bands, and Spain will never recognize that right in them.

What is it that is wished should it be recognized?

Is it not known that from the moment of their recognition they could send out vessels upon the ocean under the flag of the lone star, raise funds in foreign countries, move about with a freedom that otherwise they could never enjoy, and that they would even carry on privateering?

On reaching this point Mr. Canovas made us a minute exposition of analogous cases; he reminded us of the recognition of belligerency of the Southern States by several European powers during the war of secession against the North and the complaints created by the piratical ship Alabama, to the extreme of the claiming of an indemnity from Great Britain, the country in which she was constructed.

Mr. Canovas then summed up his views as follows:

The state of belligerency not being recognized, Spain not consenting to a declaration of war, then, within the limits of international law, the right of visit and search of vessels can not be practiced, for they being the prolongation of the frontiers and territories of the nations to which they belong, that can not be done either within or without jurisdictional waters, even in cases of the transportation of arms, because the rights of commerce can not be interfered with without breaking the ties binding nations together.

And it is so much so that when a British vessel came to our coasts with a cargo of arms during the Carlist war, and it was proposed to search her, the protest had scarcely been commenced before she was permitted to discharge them, and they would have been sold on land if there had been anybody to buy them.

And the same thing occurred to us in Jolo, where Great Britain and Germany made us understand obligations of this nature, and Spain found herself compelled to pay several indemnities in the times of Martos and Ullos.

Are more cases needed?

Then there is the affair of the Virginius, where we were obliged to return the hulk, declare her an illegal prize, and give satisfaction, and I myself had occasion to express this opinion to Mr. Castelar, then at the head of the Government, when he thought it convenient to consult me, though I was then the leader of the Alfonsine party in opposition to the Republic.

No one should proceed lightly, nor be carried away by the impulse of the moment, when his country has before it such a contention as the one now confronting Spain.

What can be demanded is the exhibition of the crew list, and the exaction that vessels can only come to anchor in the ports of entry.

Therefore, this basis being once established, it may be asked:

Then, of what service is it for us to spend money for the construction of vessels in foreign countries to guard the shores of Cuba?

The Government thinks night and day about everything affecting that national problem. Those vessels have a purpose, and they will accomplish it.

The coasts of Cuba will be guarded by a combined movement that will offer every guarantee.

There will be a fixed inner line of guard by means of pontoons situated in all the bays and places where vessels can reach, and another outer line, in constant movement.

The first will be well armed, to prevent smuggling, and the second will not be very far off, so as to aid the others quickly when necessary, these being of rapid speed.

As the vessels engaged in the free-carrying trade can only practice it in regular ports of entry, it will there be ascertained by their manifests and inspection of cargoes of what the latter consist, and in case they should attempt to land them to other places they will be considered as common smugglers and prosecuted as such before the courts, in conformity to law.

There is no need either to exaggerate or to unhinge things.

THE CUBAN PROBLEM.

When we said to Mr. Canovas that a system of home rule like that of Canada was going to be asked for Cuba, a waggish smile came over his face, and then he remarked:

"Day and night I occupy myself with this affair, under all the aspects it now has or may have in the future. I do not lose sight of, nor should the country lose sight of, the Cuban problem, which, besides the gravity it has for us in the order of politics and economics, the attention of Europe and America is fixed upon us, watching the manner and facility with which we are preparing the materials for the campaign, with observance of the course it takes, and if to the present they have had only cause for admiration, we must endeavor that they have none for censure in the future.

"The new expeditionary troops are arriving there; 25,000 men will go, and as many more as may be necessary.

"It is not only intended to advance upon them, but also to pen them up and settle the island by departments. Force is not only needed to fight and conquer, but also to occupy the recovered territories, that the evil may not reproduce itself with new demands on the resources of Spain.

"Of one thing I am certain, and that is, the nucleuses of the insurrection once vanquished, our credit will recover its wings and free itself from present embarrassment, because a nation that gives such great proofs of vitality can not less than inspire exceptional confidence in foreign countries."

What about the elections?

"Oh, do not speak of them now. The Government has other things of more pressing importance to attend to.

"We have not decided upon the month for them to take place, but it can be said with certainty they will not be held till next year. About next February we will talk about them. Both Castelar and Moret are agreed to this, though the latter advocates the meeting of the present Cortes, even only for a few days, to comply with the constitutional precept and for the approval of the budget, and so as not to have to occupy themselves further with the budget until the Cuban question is definitely settled.

"Neither is it good for the country nor its institutions to agitate public opinion by electoral excitement at a time when we should all give preferent attention to what is passing in Cuba."

Mr. CHANDLER. I want to make a suggestion to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. I understand he desires to speak more at length on this subject.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. I know the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] also desires to speak. These questions are important, but they are tedious, and I would inquire of the Senator from Alabama whether it would not be expedient to suspend the discussion and to pass a simple concurrent resolution declaring that it is the sense of Congress that the Cubans have just cause for revolution, that they have the universal sympathy of the people of the United States, and that we hope they will achieve their independence; and thereupon, Mr. President, having passed that resolution, resume this discussion and carry it on while the Cubans are fighting, with their lives in their hands, to achieve their independence, in achieving which they are not likely to get, I am sorry to say, much help from the United States?

Mr. MORGAN. If we adopt the declaration of the Committee on Foreign Relations it will cover all the Senator desires, and a little more.

Mr. CHANDLER. When shall we get the opportunity to do so?

Mr. MORGAN. So far as I am concerned, if the Senator wants to take a vote he can have it at this moment.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I ask unanimous consent for a vote upon the resolution at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the vote may be now taken.

Mr. GRAY. I object at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. CALL. If the Senator from Delaware will allow me, I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution unqualifiedly recognizing the independence of the Island of Cuba.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, it is manifest that the subject brought before the Senate by the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations is exciting interest and deserves careful consideration. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has made an interesting speech this afternoon, which he wishes to conclude, and there may be something else to be said by Senators in regard to the general subject of the recognition of the belligerency of Cuba or on the adoption of the committee resolution before action is had upon it. I therefore suggest, inasmuch as time for consideration is sometimes all important where a question of such moment as this is under consideration, that the Senate, when it adjourn, adjourn to meet on Saturday at 12 o'clock, the ordinary hour, when we are to have the pleasure of hearing the President pro tempore of the Senate read the Farewell Address of Washington, and that will necessarily take over the speech of the Senator from Alabama until Monday and such other speeches as are to be made at that time. I therefore move that the Senate adjourn until Saturday at 12 o'clock.

Mr. CHANDLER and Mr. PLATT. Say that "when the Senate adjourn."

Mr. GRAY. I will modify my motion, and move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent to say that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] specially requested that that should not be done, as he had promised certain Senators who desire to speak that they should have the opportunity to-morrow.

Mr. GRAY. I will state to the Senator from Florida that I make this motion after conference with the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Ohio expected it. All he wanted to accomplish was that there should not be a vote to-night, because he had assured certain Senators on the other side of the Chamber that that would not happen.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware, that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I submit an amendment which I propose to offer to the pending resolution when it shall be in order, to come in at the end of the resolution. I ask that the amendment may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3537) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE, Mr. BLUE, and Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana managers at the conference on the part of the House.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the pension appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3537) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, and asking for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. ALLISON, Mr. CULLOM, and Mr. BRICE were appointed.

Mr. KYLE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Saturday, February 22, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 20, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, the bill making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions (H. R. 3537) has come back from the Senate with amendments. I desire unanimous consent that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments and ask a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

I also wish unanimous consent of the House, if that request is granted, to have an order made that the bill be printed with the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make a report from the committee?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can ask unanimous consent, inasmuch as the bill has been referred to the committee, that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and the course he has suggested be taken.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I make that request.

Mr. ERDMAN. Reserving the right to object, I desire to know what the amendments are.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The Senate has made three amendments to the bill; the first is as to the wording of the language in reference to the time when the payment of pensions shall begin, which is immaterial; the next is in reference to the amount of appropriation for examining surgeons. The House appropriated $750,000, the evidence before the committee being that only $729,000 had been expended during the preceding fiscal year, and the Senate has added $50,000, making $800,000 in all. They have also added $2,760 to the item for rent of the agents' pension offices. These are the only amendments.

Mr. SAYERS. I would ask the gentleman if the only material amendments are not those affecting the amounts of the appropriations?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. That is all.

Mr. LACEY. Were there not some amendments of general legislation as to the methods in the office?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. No, sir; none except those that I have mentioned.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the House nonconcur in the amendments of the Senate and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes thereon?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE, Mr. BLUE, and Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I also desire an order that the bill be printed with the Senate amendments numbered.

The SPEAKER. The bill has already been printed, as the Chair is informed.

FOREIGN TARIFFS.

Mr. MCCALL of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCCALL] presents a privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be authorized to employ an expert or experts for the purpose of investigating the subject of foreign tariffs, with the view of ascertaining and reporting to the House what countries, if any, impose prohibitory or discriminating duties upon the products of the United States when imported into such countries, or subject such products to burdensome regulations or intentional overvaluations; and also for the purpose of inquiring into the effects of the commercial arrangements with foreign countries entered into after October 31, 1890, upon the trade with such countries, and the effect of the subsequent abandonment of such commercial arrangements upon that trade. That there be, and hereby is, appriated out of the contingent fund, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of such services and for such other expenses as are incidental to such investigation, the sum of $1,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MCCALL of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DISTRIBUTION OF SEEDS, ETC., BY THE SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Delaware asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a Senate resolution, at the request of the Committee on Agriculture. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The resolution (S. R. 43) directing the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act making appropriations for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds and for the printing and distribution of farmers' bulletins was read at length.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of that resolution.

RAILROAD COMPANIES IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5672) to grant to railroad companies in Indian Territory additional powers to secure depot grounds.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill. Before the completion of the reading,

Mr. STEELE said: Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of that bill. There is too much of it to consider by unanimous consent.

LIEUT. COL. W. A. JONES.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1821) to reopen and adjust the account for service of Lieut. Col. W. A. Jones, Corps of Engineers.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they hereby are, directed, on application being made by Lieut. Col. W. A. Jones, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, or his legal representatives, to reopen, adjust, and pay his claim for longevity service in the United States Army, in accordance with the law applicable thereto as construed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask that the report may be read, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. DENNY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1821) to reopen, adjust, and pay the account for service of Lieut. Col. W. A. Jones, Corps of Engineers, having duly considered the same, do hereby report said bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

This is a claim for longevity pay for service in the Army. It appears that the Treasury officials for quite a time construed the act of Congress providing that an officer of the Army should have an increase of pay for each five years of service in the Army in such manner as to apply only to service of commissioned officers; but after many years the Court of Claims held that it applied to the service of enlisted men and of cadets at West Point, and this decision was confirmed by the Supreme Court. It was thus fully settled that this class of officers, as a result of the aforesaid ruling of Treasury officials, had not been paid for their services the full amount intended by the longevity law. At this point the Second Comptroller of the Treasury took the stand that the accounts for service of these officers had been settled and closed, and that he could not reopen them without authority of Congress. For this reason those officers, who have thus been deprived of pay justly due them, have been forced to go before Congress for redress, as granted in the bill in this case, if passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

An amendment proposed by the Committee on Claims, to strike out the word "claim," in line 7, and insert in lieu thereof the word "account," was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FLETCHER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO SIT.

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That permission is hereby given the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service to sit during the sessions of the House during the remainder of the session of the Fifty-fourth Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

ANNEXATION OF A PORTION OF ARIZONA TO UTAH.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a memorial from the State legislature of Utah, and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Territories.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah [Mr. ALLEN] asks unanimous consent for the reading of a memorial. Does the gentleman desire to have it printed in the RECORD?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not know what the nature of the memorial is. I should like to hear a statement of it.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. I do not care to have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I shall not interpose any objection, probably, if the gentleman will state what it is; and I want to say that I have stood here in my place and objected to printing these memorials and petitions in the RECORD; but, as I have stated on a former occasion, the other body in this Congress day by day print from three to six of these memorials and petitions, and if they will not protect the RECORD it seems to me it is not incumbent upon me to do it. Therefore I shall not object. I want to state that, so that others may object if they see fit to do so.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. I do not insist that it be printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that it be read to the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The memorial praying that a portion of Arizona which is north of the Colorado River be annexed to the State of Utah was read.

Mr. PERKINS. Do I understand that this is offered to be printed in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. PERKINS. It is read, then, for the information of the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman wants it referred to what committee?

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. To the Committee on Territories.

The SPEAKER. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Territories.

DEPOT GROUNDS FOR RAILROADS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection to the consideration of the bill H. R. 5672.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas again asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill recently objected to, which will be again reported to the House.

The reading of the bill was resumed and concluded, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5672) to grant to railroad companies in Indian Territory additional powers to secure depot grounds.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any railroad company operating a railroad in the Indian Territory may acquire the right to use such additional ground as may be necessary for railway purposes at stations now existing, or for the establishment of new stations or depots, by making it appear to the Secretary of the Interior that such additional ground is necessary for railway purposes, and that the convenience of the people and the public interests will be promoted thereby: Provided, That the lands so acquired shall be subject to all the conditions and limitations as to use as are the lands for right of way and station purposes, as contained in the original acts, respectively, granting the companies rights of way through the Indian Territory.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior may, when convinced that such application is proper, and after allowing opportunity for all parties in interest to be heard before him, grant the use of such additional lands held by the Indians in common as may be necessary for depot purposes; but before taking possession of and using such lands the railroad company shall deposit with the treasury of the tribe to which the lands belong compensation in cash at the rate of $25 per acre: Provided, That if such tribe shall not be satisfied with the compensation herein provided, and the same can not be amicably determined, the amount to be paid by such railroad company to such tribe and the necessity for such taking shall be ascertained in the same manner as is prescribed by section 3 of this act with respect to compensation to be paid individual occupants on any land so taken: Provided further, That before taking possession of and using such additional lands the railroad company in interest shall file a map of definite location of the same with the Secretary of the Interior, which map shall be subject to the approval of such Secretary.

SEC. 3. That when lands desired by a railroad company under the provisions of this act are held by individual occupants according to the laws, customs, and usages of any of the nations or tribes through whose lands the road is constructed, full compensation, in addition to the compensation to be paid the nation or tribe herein provided for, shall be paid to such occupant for all property taken and damage done by reason of the occupancy of the lands by the company for station purposes; and where the compensation can not be agreed upon between the company and the occupant, the company may apply to the Secretary of the Interior, who shall thereupon appoint three disinterested referees, who, before entering upon the duties of their appointment, shall take and subscribe, before competent authority, an oath that they will faithfully and impartially discharge the duties of their appointment, which oath, duly certified, shall be returned with their award. In case the referees can not agree, then any two of them are authorized to make the award. Either party dissatisfied with the finding of the referees shall have the right, within ninety days after the making of the award and notice of the same, to appeal by original petition to the United States court for the Indian Territory in and for the district wherein the land sought to be so taken may be situate, where the case, both as to the necessity for the taking as well as the amount of damages, shall be tried de novo. When proceedings have been commenced in court and the court has determined the necessity for such taking, the railroad company shall pay double the amount of the award into court to abide the judgment thereof, and then to have the right to enter upon the property sought to be condemned and proceed with the construction of such depot with the necessary tracks. Each of said referees shall receive for his services the sum of $4 per day for each day they are engaged in the trial of any case submitted to them under this act, with mileage of 5 cents per mile for each mile actually traveled. Witnesses shall receive the usual fees allowed by the court, and all costs, including compensation of the referees, shall be made a part of the award and be paid by such railroad company.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PENDLETON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

ISSUE OF ORDNANCE STORES AND SUPPLIES.

The SPEAKER. One moment. The Chair desires to lay before the House a request for change of reference of the bill (H. R. 1674) for the issue of ordnance stores and supplies to the State of Nebraska to replace similar stores destroyed by fire from the Committee on Military Affairs to the Committee on the Militia. The change is made at the request of both committees.

There was no objection.

BRINGING DESTITUTE AMERICAN CITIZENS FROM MEXICO.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a change of reference of the message from the President, dated January 27, 1896, asking for an appropriation to reimburse certain railroads for services for bringing home several hundred destitute American citizens. As it calls for an appropriation, it should be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the change of reference will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6249) making appropriations for current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill H. R. 6249.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I shall occupy the attention of the committee for a few minutes only——

The CHAIRMAN. The first thing in order will be the reading of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I shall occupy the attention of the committee for a few minutes only to explain in a general way the features of the bill making appropriation for the Indian service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897. When the bill is read by sections its various provisions that are not fully understood by the committee or by the House myself or my associates upon the committee will be glad to fully explain as they are reached. The bill, as a whole, Mr. Chairman, appropriates one hundred and thirty-two thousand and some odd dollars less than the appropriation bill last year. It appropriates also $119,000 less than the estimates of the Department for the present fiscal year. The total amount proposed to be appropriated by the bill is $8,630,955.17. Of this amount $2,000,000 is composed of items not current expenses of the year, so that the real amount for the current expenses is six million five hundred and ninety-seven thousand and some odd dollars. The various sections of the bill appropriating for current expenses, salaries, and the like, appropriates $738,000; for fulfilling treaties, $4,593,000, and for miscellaneous support, in which is included only those items which are absolutely gratuities on the part of the Government, $611,000. The incidental expenses are $84,000. The apppropriation for the support of the schools, which is, in part, as you all know, a gratuity, is $365,000. The miscellaneous items, which I will not now explain in detail, amount to $388,000.

In the construction of the bill it has been found expedient to drop two agencies which have heretofore been appropriated for. Those agencies, as the committee understands, I assume, are dropped by Executive order, requiring no statutory provision. The committee have also added one additional agency. The Lower Brule Agency, in South Dakota, which has formerly been under the Crow Creek Agency, is made a separate agency, but it involves no additional appropriation. The Crow Creek agent has heretofore received $1,800 per annum, and his clerk at the Lower Brule, $1,200. In this bill we cut the salary of the Crow Creek agent to $1,600 and add $200 to the salary of the clerk at the Lower Brule, where we establish the new agency.

In the last two Indian appropriation bills the salary for Indian inspectors has been fixed at $2,500. The Revised Statutes, section 2044, provides for a salary of $3,000 a year for these inspectors. I take it that when we, in violation of the statute, appropriate a less amount for the salaries than is there provided for, the person who holds the office has a claim against the Government for the balance. With that idea in view, we have in this bill appropriated $3,000 for the salary for each of these gentlemen, which is in accord with the statutes of the United States covering that question.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman—but I will wait until the gentleman concludes his remarks.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will be glad to yield to an interruption, so as to explain any feature of the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understood the gentleman to say that the bill carries an increase of the salaries of Indian inspectors.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is an increase from the last appropriation bill, which in violation of the statute decreased the salary to $2,500, and we simply follow the statute.

Mr. DOCKERY. If it does not interrupt the gentleman, will he please state how many increases of salary are carried in the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. Outside of the school department there are no increases in the salaries provided. There are increased officers provided—for instance, superintendent of irrigation—but for no stated officer outside the superintendent of schools is the salary increased in this bill. There is the case of these inspectors, but in that increase we simply follow the statute.

Mr. DOCKERY. Have you decreased the salary in any case?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; except one or two—two or three school superintendents. The entire list of school superintendents has been revised. Some of them have been increased slightly—$200 or $300; others are decreased, so that in the entire list the increased amount of salaries is $1,100 only.

Mr. DOCKERY. Did I understand the gentleman to state that the reason why these salaries were increased was because the statute fixed them at the amount carried in this bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. As to inspectors, certainly.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understood him to say also that in the event of a failure to appropriate the full amount fixed in the statute the officers whose salaries were decreased would have a right to go to the Court of Claims and recover.

Mr. SHERMAN. I assume that they would.

Mr. DOCKERY. On that point the gentleman is doubtless familiar with the practice of the House in respect to such cases, because since the Forty-fourth Congress a large number of salaries have been appropriated for below the statutory limit. The gentleman understands, I suppose, that the possibility of the suits to which he refers has been obviated by a provision in each bill that the salaries carried in that bill shall be in "full compensation" for the services rendered. Now, rather than increase salaries, it seems to me that the gentleman should insert that proviso, which would obviate the danger of any claim against the Government, while the salaries would be appropriated at the amounts fixed by the law when these gentlemen accepted the offices.

Mr. SHERMAN. Most of the gentlemen who occupy these positions now were appointed when the salary was $3,000.

Mr. DOCKERY. When were they reduced?

Mr. SHERMAN. They were first reduced in the last Congress. I think the statute fixing the salaries was passed in the seventies or possibly in the eighties, I do not remember exactly; but it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that if we are to change these salaries at all the proper course would be not to take any particular officer by the throat and say to him, "You must take this or nothing," but to amend the statute fixing the salaries.

Mr. DOCKERY. But the gentleman knows that as a matter of practice that is very difficult to do. Independent legislation is difficult to be had here.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman recognizes that fact, I think, from one or two provisions which I see further on in this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

Mr. DOCKERY. Now, I desire to ask my friend for information whether he is familiar with the reasons which induced the last Congress to decrease these salaries?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am not. I never heard any special reason assigned for the reduction other than the desire of the former chairman of the committee for economy, and I will say to my friend further, that the reduction did not meet the approval of the Department.

Mr. CANNON. In a case of this kind, where the Democrats, having full possession of the House, the Senate, and the Presidency, fixed the pay of these inspectors at $2,500 a year, does he think it good policy, during this Democratic Administration at least, for us to come in and insist on increasing that pay from $2,500 to $3,000? [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer my friend that I think it is good policy at all times, regardless of what party is in power, to be fair and reasonable.

Mr. TAWNEY. And honest.

Mr. SHERMAN. And to enact such legislation as we believe will be for the benefit of the service.

Mr. CANNON. Has my friend any information which would lead him to say to the House, from his own investigations, that these inspectors are not receiving pay adequate to their services when they receive $2,500 a year with all expenses paid?

Mr. SHERMAN. Other than the opinion of the Indian Bureau I have none. I base my judgment upon the statement of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. CANNON. If this Republican House fails to increase these salaries $500 a year for each of these officials, are we liable to lose the valuable services of these Democratic inspectors? [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Very frankly I will say to my friend I think we are not.

Mr. CANNON. Well, as we have a great and good Democratic President who approved the act decreasing the salaries of these officials to $2,500, I suggest to my friend whether it is not of doubtful propriety for us to thrust this increase upon them.

Mr. SHERMAN. The committee have taken a different view from that of my honorable friend from Illinois.

Mr. HOPKINS. As I understand the chairman of the committee, the salary in these cases is restored in accordance with the recommendation of the Department, regardless of the politics of the individuals who hold the offices.

Mr. SHERMAN. Most certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. And in proposing this legislation, you are proposing it in the interest of the country and not in the interest of any political party.

Mr. SHERMAN. Most certainly; and in accord with the statutes of the United States.

Mr. CANNON. I think if we could cut these salaries one-third we would be doing well. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill whether it contains any provision to pay the expenses of the commission of citizens constituted by the act of 1869. I do not observe any such provision in the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will come to that in a moment. Mr. Chairman, the following section also provides, in reference to the inspectors:

That the accounting officers of the Treasury be, and are hereby, authorized and directed to settle claims of Indian inspectors for traveling and other expenses heretofore incurred while on duty in Washington under orders of the Secretary of the Interior, where such claims have been disallowed or suspended by the said accounting officers: Provided further, That the sum expended for this purpose shall not exceed $1,000.

Heretofore inspectors have been ordered to Washington by the Secretary and kept here by his orders, and the accounting officers of the Treasury have refused to audit their accounts for expenses. The Secretary asks, therefore, that a provision be inserted in this bill allowing him to adjust the accounts of these officers who have heretofore come here and stayed here on his order, so that they may be paid.

Mr. DOCKERY. In that connection, I wish to call the attention of my friend to the language of the proviso, and to suggest to him whether, in the event that this policy should be deemed a wise one, it might not be well to state that this allowance is made notwithstanding the act of August 5, 1882; because under that act it is unlawful for the accounting officers to pass these accounts. I merely submit this suggestion for the gentleman's consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the gentleman is right about that; and when we reach that provision I believe it would be well to make such an amendment as he suggests.

In answer to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL], let me state that the committee deemed it wise to omit the appropriation of $4,000 for the expenses of a commission of citizens to be present at the opening of the bids and to assist in the examination of goods furnished under the bids accepted. The idea of the committee was this: In another portion of the bill we appropriate $40,000 to pay for the services of experts in various lines to examine first the samples submitted, and then to examine the goods to see whether they are equal to the samples. It seemed to us that the real object of this commission of citizens was to relieve the Commissioner of Indian Affairs of a part of his responsibility. It seemed to us that it was not our duty thus to relieve him. The committee has confidence in the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs, believing that he is qualified to discharge the duties of his office in the interests of the public service, and that he needs no commission of citizens to watch over him to see that he executes the law. We believe we should not give him a commission to share with him the responsibility. It is his duty to accept all the responsibility assumed by him in entering upon his duties. Those were the reasons which impelled the committee to leave out that appropriation of $4,000.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether this commission has not been established by law, whether it is not now in existence under the law, and whether what is now proposed is not simply a failure to appropriate for a commission already provided for?

Mr. SHERMAN. This is a commission provided for by law, but its members act without compensation. They can adjust this matter for themselves under the general law if they desire.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. But I understand this is a general commission already established——

Mr. SHERMAN. That is true.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. The members of the commission have never been paid anything. It was established under the recommendation of President Grant in 1869. The appropriations which have heretofore been made have provided simply for the payment of the expenses of the commission.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a correct statement; but the conditions which existed in 1869 are quite different, I think, from those existing now. The members of the commission act without compensation, at any rate. The appropriation heretofore made provided simply for reimbursing their expenses. The members of the commission can act under the general law if they so desire.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Would not the action proposed by the committee practically legislate the commission out of existence, by not making the appropriation to pay their expenses?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it would.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Does not the gentleman think it would be better in this case, as was suggested in a similar case yesterday, to bring in a separate bill repealing the law establishing the commission rather than to strike it down by refusing to make the appropriation necessary to sustain it? An attempt similar to this was made in the last Congress to strike down the Civil Service Commission by refusing to make appropriations for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, I do not think these are parallel cases. This is a commission whose members serve gratuitously, and the matter of an appropriation to provide for their expenses is really a bagatelle. Let me say, however, that the failure to appropriate does not of necessity strike down the commission, the members of which I assume are philanthropic men; otherwise they would not care to act at all.

Following the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the committee has made provision in the bill for a superintendent of irrigation. Considerable money is appropriated directly in aid of irrigation on the various reservations, and certain funds belonging to different tribes are now being expended in furtherance of that object. It seemed to the committee wise, as recommended by the Secretary, that a competent and skilled head of that division should be provided for to see that the large sum of money appropriated for that purpose is judiciously expended. The recommendation of the Secretary was for a considerably larger sum than that appropriated by the committee in the bill. We believed that for a less sum than he recommended we could at least make a trial.

Mr. HOPKINS. Is there anything in the law at present which provides for an officer of that kind?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; it is new legislation.

The bill also provides (and this is also new legislation) an appropriation of $3,000 for a digest of the Indian laws and the decisions of the courts in reference to Indian matters. There is no such book now in existence; and the committee has been more or less embarrassed by the absence of such a work. We believe that the business of our committee would be very much expedited by having the laws, the treaties, and the decisions collated and properly published in one volume. Hence the recommendation of the Secretary for an appropriation of $5,000 has been accepted to the extent of providing an appropriation of $3,000 for a digest of this kind.

I have already suggested the change which has been made in the appropriations in reference to superintendents of schools. The general policy of the Government, as declared by acts of Congress heretofore, to do away with sectarian schools, has been followed by the committee in framing this bill. This policy was inaugurated in the first session of the Fifty-third Congress; and the Secretary of the Interior was asked to make a report as to the advisability of dispensing at an early day with the contract schools, otherwise known as sectarian schools. The Secretary, in obedience to that law, did make a full and exhaustive report, in which he stated (to put it briefly) that the contract schools could be done away with; that he believed it would be wise to adopt that course; and that they could be finally disposed of, he thought, within five or six years.

Following that suggestion the House last year provided that in making contracts with the existing schools the Secretary should be limited to 80 per cent of the contracts of the previous year; that is, the fiscal year 1895. In this bill we follow that precise line by providing that the Secretary may make contracts not to exceed 60 per cent of the amounts of the contracts for the fiscal year 1896.

Mr. GRAFF. Just there, will the gentleman permit me to ask how much was appropriated or expended for the year 1895 on contract schools?

Mr. SHERMAN. About a half million of dollars. I have not the figures before me and can not give the exact amount, but it is approximately that.

Mr. HOPKINS. And the present appropriation, as I understand it, is 60 per cent of the amount of the appropriation for 1896 for that purpose?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, that is correct. So that if this policy is pursued in the future for five years, at the expiration of that time there will be none of these contract schools in existence.

Mr. HOPKINS. You do not mean five years from now, but from the time that policy was inaugurated?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, from the time the policy was inaugurated. It will be three years from now. At the expiration of this time we will have none of these contract schools.

Mr. GRAFF. So that, if I understand the gentleman, the amount expended this year, or to be expended for that purpose, will be about $300,000?

Mr. SHERMAN. Something like that. It may not be quite so much, but in the neighborhood of $300,000.

Mr. GAMBLE. If the gentleman will permit me, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs states that the amount will be about $299,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I supposed in the neighborhood of $300,000. He states in his report that for the fiscal year 1895 the amount applied for this purpose reached $463,505.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is for 1895.

Mr. GAMBLE. Yes, for 1895, and this fiscal year $370,796. Then, with the 20 per cent reduction this year, ending June 30, 1897, it would make the amount $299,000, in round numbers.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the correct amount.

Mr. GRAFF. Can the gentleman state what proportion of the $500,000 expended in the fiscal year 1895 was for sectarian schools?

Mr. SHERMAN. All of it.

Mr. GAMBLE. I think not all.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, practically all of it.

Mr. GAMBLE. There were contracts entered into with the public schools, as the gentleman will remember, to a limited extent.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, to a limited extent; but practically all of that amount was applied to the sectarian schools.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman does not count Lincoln School and Hampton Institute in that category?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; they are covered by special appropriations, and are not touched by this proviso.

Mr. GRAFF. Is it not true that since the adoption of this 20 per cent provision—the annual reduction of 20 per cent on the appropriations of the preceding year—all the schools of this character, practically, have voluntarily withdrawn any requests for aid except one or two of them?

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, I will say to my friend that anyway a single sect controlled practically most of the schools in the first place—a large majority of them at all events. In applying the money under the reduction of last year, as shown by the Secretary's report, he did not make a horizontal reduction of 20 per cent in every school, but he did in certain schools, exercising his discretion with reference to others; but the schools which have been reduced as a rule said, voluntarily, that "if we are to be reduced 20 per cent each year until we are wiped out altogether, we are ready to quit now," and the contract ceased, accordingly, at that time.

Mr. GRAFF. Did they not continue to educate the Indian children, however, without any appropriation from the Government after that?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that is not the case. While it might have been true in some instances, it was not generally the case.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. In three cases the report of the Commissioners shows that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs made arrangement either to rent the buildings or buy them outright, and the Government, in these instances where that proposition was accepted, has run the schools itself. That was about all that voluntarily gave up, and they passed under the control of the Government.

Mr. HOPKINS. As the gentleman has referred to the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs with regard to these sectarian schools and the need of providing some means of education for the Indian children, I would like to know what percentage of the schools have been discontinued and replaced by Government or public schools?

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend would look at the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, pages 10 and 11, he will find a full statement of the facts in reference to the 20 per cent reduction, and he will find on page 11 the names of the schools which have been discontinued as contract schools under the operation of that provision of law. They amount to five in number.

Mr. HOPKINS. Where these schools have been discontinued, have Government schools taken their place, or have these children been transferred to other sectarian schools?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Commissioner says that these buildings are sold or rented to the Government for Indian school use. That is, where the contract system has been abandoned in these particular schools, either the Government has purchased or leased the same building and continued the education—I assume of the same scholars—at the school.

Mr. GRAFF. It is probably true, is it not, that 95 per cent of this sum appropriated to sectarian schools would go to one sect?

Mr. SHERMAN. A very large per cent would practically go to one sect; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. GAMBLE. I think the Commissioner's report for 1895, on page 13, discloses the amount that goes to the support of schools, and, as indicated by the gentleman from Illinois, some of the sects have withdrawn from asking any further support.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend from Illinois will take the trouble to send for the Commissioner's report, he will find on pages 10, 11, 12, and 13 a full statement in detail of the facts about which he makes inquiry.

The treaty provisions with the Indians are, of course, carried out in full. That is a matter over which the committee have no power whatever. They must fulfill the treaty provisions to the letter, and the only place where any latitude is given in the amount appropriated is where a treaty provides for the furnishing, not of so much money, but of so many blankets, so many barrels of flour, so much meat, and so forth, and of course the amount in such cases must of necessity be regulated by the current price of the commodities which the treaty provides shall be furnished.

Under the Sioux treaty the sum of $75,000 has been ordinarily appropriated, and $75,000 was appropriated last year, but there has been an accumulation for some years, so that there is upward of $40,000 now in that fund, and on the Commissioner's suggestion we reduced that appropriation this year to $25,000, the accumulation being sufficient to make up for the difference. Otherwise there are no changes in treaty stipulations.

In reference to the schools at Carlisle, Pa., and Lawrence, Kans., the committee changed the phraseology of the bill so as to provide for maintenance of so many children, and for repairs of buildings, and so forth, such and such an amount, and the support for the children not to exceed $167 each. The reason for this is that in these two schools, perhaps because they have a very large number of pupils, it is possible to support pupils for less money than it is in some of the smaller schools, and where the superintendent is given authority, as we have given it to him in this bill, to use this fund for the support of so many children and for his repairs and improvements, he finds it possible to keep his buildings in repair without asking us specifically for an appropriation for that purpose. In neither case do we appropriate for that purpose. The legislative provisions of the bill, which do not appropriate any money, are set out on the last page of the report.

The most important of these, perhaps, is the first, which provides that the child of an Indian mother and a white father shall be entitled to tribal relations, shall inherit as of the mother. The law now provides that the child of an Indian father and white mother follows its father, and the committee saw no reason why the same privilege should not be accorded to the child of an Indian mother and a white father.

Mr. HOPKINS. Before the gentleman reaches that, I should like to have him explain a little more fully than I find stated in the report the clause relating to the claims of the Ogden Land Company to certain real estate in New York.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will do that. Over one hundred years ago the tribes of Indians occupying the Allegany and Chautauqua reservations, and other reservations, made what is variously called a deed or a lease—it is a provisional deed—to the Ogden Land Company that conveyed a fee to the Ogden Land Company, subject to the perpetual user of the tribes so long as they maintain tribal relations. That, the Secretary says, and I have so stated in my report, has been a constant source of annoyance to the Department. These lands are located in the midst of a busy community. Upon the lands there are to-day existing villages, some of them with a population of over 5,000 inhabitants. These lands are held under leases from Indians. Now, the desire of the Department has been to dispose of this claim of the Ogden Land Company and to allot the lands in severalty and to open them up for the progress of civilization. The lands are fairly worth to-day, on an average, from $40 to $50 an acre. The same claim to certain lands situated in Niagara County—the same title of the Ogden Land Company in the lands of the Tuscarora Indians in that county—was purchased forty years ago, and for that the Government paid $10 an acre.

The Secretary, in his first report to the Fifty-third Congress, stated that $10 per acre, which is the claim of the Ogden Land Company, would not be an excessive claim. The question of title has been raised here in former Congresses. The legislature of the State of New York and the courts of the State of New York have held that the Ogden Land Company did have a valid and existing lien on this property. The Secretary, after the passage of the last year's act, submitted the question of title to the Department of Justice. At the time this report was written the report of the Department of Justice had not been made. I understand this morning that the report has been received from the Department of Justice at the Indian Office, and that that report states that the Ogden Land Company have a valid lien upon this land. In order to dispose of that land, so that we may open up this land in severalty to the Indians and purchase whatever that interest may be, last year the Secretary appointed a commissioner, Mr. Garrett, of Philadelphia, I think, who has had negotiations with the representatives of the company, and the fact has been demonstrated that that title can now be purchased at $5 per acre.

Mr. HOPKINS. I want to ask the gentleman why the Government of the United States should buy this land?

Mr. SHERMAN. How else will we get it?

Mr. HOPKINS. Is not this Indian tribe that controls the land able to remove that cloud themselves?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think they are neither able nor desirous of doing it.

Mr. HOPKINS. How does it affect the interests of the United States Government? As long as they hold their tribal relations this company has no right there, as I understand.

Mr. SHERMAN. No.

Mr. HOPKINS. It is only after they break up their tribal relations.

Mr. SHERMAN. They can not allot these lands in severalty while this claim of the Ogden Land Company exists.

Mr. HOPKINS. I know; but has the Government of the United States any control of the matter while the Indians continue in their tribal relations?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Secretary says it has. He says it is a serious hindrance to the prosperity and advancement of the Indians themselves.

Mr. HOPKINS. What sort? Does he cite anything except the bare statement?

Mr. SHERMAN. This is what he says:

It is a most serious hindrance to the prosperity or advancement of the Indians, and an endless amount of trouble and annoyance to the Department. In order to carry out the policy of the Government to allot lands in severalty to these Indians with a view of their eventual absorption into the body politic, it is absolutely necessary to extinguish the claim of said company to the land in question, and, in my opinion, that should be done at once.

Mr. HOPKINS. As I understand the gentleman in charge of the bill, this contract with the Ogden Land Company was made nearly a century ago?

Mr. SHERMAN. I so understand.

Mr. HOPKINS. Does the gentleman know what action, if any, has been recommended by previous Secretaries of the Interior?

Mr. SHERMAN. None other than I have given; that was taken, as I said a moment ago, in 1857, where precisely the same condition existed with the Tuscarora Indians, over in Niagara County, and on that recommendation that title was bought at $10 an acre. The land was less valuable then, and very much less than the lands in question.

Mr. HOPKINS. This Ogden Land Company is a corporation, is it not?

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe it is a New York corporation, although I may be mistaken. It think it is perhaps a copartnership. If my friend, Mr. HOOKER, were here he could tell us definitely.

Mr. HOPKINS. It could not have continued as a copartnership for one hundred years.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I am mistaken about it. My impression was that it was a copartnership, but doubtless I am mistaken. It is a corporation, I suppose.

Mr. HOPKINS. What I was getting at by this inquiry is to find out the personnel of the company, who they are, and where they reside.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know.

Mr. HOPKINS. And whether they are instrumental in seeking the influence of the Secretary of the Interior, or whether this comes from sources friendly to the Indians themselves.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can not tell the gentleman. I do not know where it emanates from. I assume that the statement of the Secretary emanates from himself, that this title of the Ogden Land Company stands as a barrier to the general policy of the Department. I presume there is no one in the country more anxious to have the Indians take their land in severalty with a view to their absorption into the body politic than the present Secretary, and I presume it emanated from him with a view that these Indians may become citizens eventually and be absorbed in the body politic.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. How many acres are there of these lands?

Mr. SHERMAN. Fifty thousand acres.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then it will cost $500,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; $250,000. We only suggest in our bill to give $5 an acre, although, as I said, forty years ago $10 an acre was given for lands that were of less value, and the Secretary states that $10 is not an exorbitant amount; but the Commissioner has had certain negotiations with them and they will accept $5 an acre.

Mr. HOPKINS. I would like to get at the fact upon that proposition, and I will ask the gentleman if the report of this Mr. Garrett is available, so that the members of the House can get it and learn the facts upon which he makes this recommendation to the Secretary?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Garrett has made no written report. He has consulted with the parties—I do not know who they are—representing this company; and the Secretary has advised me in a personal interview that such negotiations have been had that he is satisfied that the lands can be purchased for $5 per acre. Of course, if they can not this provision will not amount to anything and will do no harm to the Government.

Mr. HOPKINS. My inquiry is directed to this point: That we, as legislators, ought to have an independent judgment on this subject over and beyond the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior; and I find nothing in the report on which to base such judgment except the bare statement that this purchase is desirable.

Mr. SHERMAN. That it is desirable for a particular reason, which is stated, the reason being that we desire to divide up these lands in severalty and to give to these Indians citizenship, thereby absorbing them into the community at large and at the same time throwing open valuable lands to settlement.

Mr. HOPKINS. There may not be any difference between us as to the advisability of doing away with the tribal relation and dividing in severalty the territory now controlled by this tribe; but there may be considerable diversity of sentiment as to the amount, if any, that we should pay to this land company. Now, if all the facts were spread before us we might agree that $5 per acre is a reasonable sum; or, on the other hand, it might appear that in equity this company is not entitled to a dollar, and therefore it may not be advisable for this Congress to appropriate even the minimum sum of $250,000 which is recommended.

Mr. SHERMAN. The House will have before it the opinion of the Attorney-General as to the title to these lands before it is called upon to pass on the question.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Does the claim of the Ogden Land Company cover the whole of this 50,000 acres?

Mr. SHERMAN. It does.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Does it cover the land on which this town has been built?

Mr. SHERMAN. It does.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I understand that under the act of March 2, 1895, the Attorney-General has inquired into the title to these lands, and has made a report which has not yet reached Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. The report is to be sent in to-day. I have not seen it, but I understand that it is a report which states that the Ogden Land Company has a title.

Mr. DOCKERY. There are 50,000 acres of land involved?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOCKERY. Did the United States ever own these lands, so that it could part with them?

Mr. SHERMAN. These were Indian lands before the Constitution of the United States was adopted, as I understand.

Mr. DOCKERY. Is it not true that the title to these lands was in controversy between the States of New York and Massachusetts?

Mr. SHERMAN. If that is true it is news to me.

Mr. DOCKERY. Was it not in controversy in 1786, and is it not a fact that by some arrangement the title or the sovereignty over these lands passed to the State of New York?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not so understand the matter.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HOPKINS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 147) granting a pension to George W. Case, late private Company B, Twenty-second New York Cavalry;

A bill (H. R. 1605) granting a pension to Anna Kelley;

A bill (H. R. 1785) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to donate one condemned cannon and four pyramids of condemned cannon balls to W. H. Wallace Post, No. 66, Grand Army of the Republic, of Eldorado, Kans., and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 3698) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Jane Dulany; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 121) calling upon the Secretary of War for certain information in relation to the harbor at Manitowoc, in the State of Wisconsin.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 4960) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to ask the House to concur in the amendments made by the Senate in the diplomatic and consular bill, all of those amendments having been sent to the committee by the Secretary of State and considered by the committee before the bill went through the Senate, but after it was presented here. The amendments are not numerous or extensive. They are a provision relating to the salary of the consul at Cape Town, in Africa, a provision making him a consul-general with salary of $3,000 instead of $2,000; setting apart $10,000 for the inspection of consulates, and a provision for an additional secretary of legation to Liberia, at $1,500. The remainder of the bill is unchanged, and I now ask that the House concur in the amendments.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I unite with my colleague, the chairman of the committee, in asking concurrence in these Senate amendments. They have been fully discussed by the members of the committee and I trust the House will concur.

Mr. CANNON. The amendments had better be read.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Page 3, after line 17, insert "For secretary of legation to Liberia, $1,500."
Page 3, lines 21 and 22, strike out "seventy-seven thousand five hundred" and insert "seventy-nine thousand."
Page 12, line 19, after "Singapore," insert "Cape Town, Africa."
Page 12, line 20, strike out "thirty" and insert "thirty-three."
Page 13, line 4, strike out "two" and insert "six."
Page 13, line 6, strike out "twenty-one" and insert "seventeen."
Page 14, line 16, strike out "Osaka and Hiogo" and insert "and Osaka and Hiogo."
Page 21, after line 2, insert "Inspection of consulates: To provide for the expenses of an inspection of consulates to be made by officers of the Government, such officers not to receive any compensation in addition to their regular salaries, which shall continue to be paid to them during the period of their employment in this special service, $10,000, to be immediately available."

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Speaker, let us take the last amendment first—this provision for an inspection of consulates—$10,000, to be immediately available. Who is to have that job?

Mr. HITT. This is to provide for expenses to be incurred in the performance of this duty by officers of the Government who are salaried and who are to be detailed to inspect these consulates throughout the world. The provision will not add to the number of salaried officers now employed, but will require those who are detailed for the purpose to perform additional duty and to incur additional expense. The amount asked for was $20,000, and $10,000 is the amount given.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that; but who is to have the trip around the world with his expenses paid?

Mr. HITT. This will not be an inspection of the body of the consulates by any one man. It will be an inspection, for example, of the consulates in western Europe through one of the consuls-general there in obedience to the orders of the Department. Again, in Asia there will be another man, a man who is already in the service of the Government and who will receive no additional pay.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that. For instance, the consul at Liverpool or at London desiring, for the good of the service, to go over to Paris or to Vienna or down to Rome, he is detailed for that purpose, and he draws his regular salary, and this appropriation pays his expenses. Am I correct in that?

Mr. HITT. The consul sent on this service would receive the expenses necessarily incurred in the performance of this duty.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that; but it is also the expenses of his trip. Is not that the case? Or perhaps my friend is not informed about it specifically.

Mr. HITT. I know that the men are not now named, nor are they designated in anybody's mind, because they are numerous; they are scattered here and there——

Mr. CANNON. Is this a new line of expenditure?

Mr. HITT. It is, except that it has been followed in the cases of some individuals who have done this duty under direction of the State Department. It is not a new project. It has been recommended by a series of Secretaries of State.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Allow me to put a question on this point to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT]. Is it not true that for several years we have been asked to recommend an appropriation of not less than $20,000 at any one time for the inspection of consulates? It has been understood that it was very necessary that this inspection should be made. But at this time we have only put in the bill an appropriation of $10,000, and it is understood that this service is to be rendered by men who are already in office.

Mr. CANNON. Will my friend from Kentucky allow me a moment? Many years ago, about the time of my first entering on public service here, Bishop Newman was appointed an inspector of consulates; and he went all around the world, making subsequently a report that was wonderfully valuable. It is the only report covering the inspection of consulates that I have ever seen that was of any value. I recollect very well, however, that at that time one or two political campaigns were largely conducted upon the "extravagance" of appointing an officer to go around the world inspecting these consulates.

Now, I can see the propriety, if not the necessity, of taking somebody that has no official connection with the Department of State, a person of sufficient intelligence and industry, and sending him to make the inspection of consulates. But, although I do not profess to have full knowledge on this question, if I were going to make a guess, I would guess that this $10,000 would be expended to pay some consul already in Europe to take a trip down the Mediterranean (if he be in service in the northern part of Europe) to inspect the other consulates. I think that would be a good thing for the man detailed on that duty, if he wanted to go down to southern Europe to see the blue skies and enjoy the bright sunshine, but it would be a poor thing for the public service.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. But there is nothing in this appropriation which indicates that any consul already in Europe will be appointed to inspect the other consulates.

Mr. CANNON. Such a one can be appointed, can he not?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. But the expenditure of this appropriation is left to the Secretary of State——

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. And he, I have no doubt, would select good men.

Mr. CANNON. He would select somebody in the consular service, would he not?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. In my opinion, he would not select any man now in Europe or in the consular service. I do not think he would.

Mr. HITT. One of the chief purposes of such inspection, after the detection of frauds or irregularities, is to produce uniformity in the methods of doing business and to enable the Department itself to know the details of the work in these offices by other means than upon information furnished by reports of interested parties. To send an officer in whom the Department has confidence to inspect the consulates of China and the East is considered to be a matter of importance; and there is not now a dollar available for any such purpose.

At a time when I was necessarily made somewhat familiar with duties of this kind, a consul stationed on the western side of South America, remote from inspection, had gone on making fair reports until by accident a means was found to have him visited by an officer who could be trusted. Then it was found that all the accounts of the officer were frauds; that his boarding bills were manufactured; that he had been robbing the Treasury to the extent of thousands of dollars. And it took but one hour's work of a skilled consular officer to discover all that. Now, these reports are of considerable importance to the public interest, aside from that of the Treasury.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend that "one swallow does not necessarily make a summer." I have no doubt the case he speaks of was as he states it. The point I was trying to make in my criticism was that when you take the Department of State with its organization here in Washington, and then take the consuls in the service of the Government throughout the world, it would not be very good policy to set one consul after another. I make this remark with all due respect to the Department of State and its service, which I think is in the main of a very high order. Yet I have a suspicion, if not actual knowledge, that the ordinary service under that Department is a little Schleswig-Holstein affair, where the rule is "tickle me and I'll tickle you." [Laughter.] And I would rather have one tour of inspection by a broad, liberal, well-informed man not connected with the Department than to have this $10,000 appropriation run a dozen years, to be utilized by sending one consul to investigate another. That is all I desire to say about this matter.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any item that exists with reference to our consular service of greater interest and importance than the adoption of such a provision as that incorporated in this bill by the Senate, to provide for such an inspection of our service as is proposed here.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who has just spoken, says that one swallow does not make a summer. I admit that; but I would like, for the information of the House, to give my own experience on this subject. When I had the honor to be appointed as minister of the United States to Brazil I visited every consulate on the coast from Para to Santos, and the result was such that on returning home I felt it incumbent upon me to call the attention of the public to the facts, and prepared an article, which was published in the North American Review shortly after, giving a history of the investigation made at that time and of the circumstances attending it, as well as the facts that were ascertained by the investigation. It called public attention to the conditions existing.

So far as the point of the gentleman from Illinois is concerned, that an outside inspection would be better than by some one who is entirely familiar with the customs of the service, I think the statement of fact refutes itself. It is absolutely necessary to have some one who has a technical knowledge of the duties of a consul. It is necessary that he shall have experience in the preparation of papers, in the transaction of the business of the consulate, and in the consideration of the many affairs which come before that official. It is also necessary that he shall have some general knowledge of the country in which the consulates are located, and therefore, with all due respect to the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois, I am satisfied that an inspection by any man who is not familiar with the details of the service would neither be satisfactory nor efficient. Such an inspection could not be as valuable to the Department as that made by a man who is selected under direction of the Secretary of State, a man who has had practical experience in the workings of that branch of the public service, who is able to determine that the consul is performing his duties, who can ascertain that the papers being prepared are properly prepared and are duly filed, and who can comprehend, in a word, all of the manifold duties required of a consul.

It is absolutely necessary, if we wish to extend our foreign commerce, to have accurate and reliable information from all of our consuls abroad, and they should be kept up to their duties. The Department should have proper knowledge that suitable persons are occupying these responsible positions as agents for the Government. For these reasons I feel satisfied that the inspection here suggested will be for the good of the service, and I hope the House will so understand and will adopt the Senate amendment. I think it will be a very serious mistake to reject it.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the honorable gentleman in charge of this bill to the necessity of an amendment, if not now at least in some other bill, in reference to the provision which appropriated $20,000 for preparing, printing, publishing, and distributing, under the Department of State, consular and other commercial reports.

There are now two or three clerks, as the gentleman knows, employed in that work under this provision. Under a recent decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury, however, their accounts can not be allowed. By an oversight, I understand, the Senate failed to amend the paragraph to allow $2,500, or something like that, for clerical services. I merely suggest it to the gentleman, so that it may be remedied on some other bill.

Mr. HITT. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that I was assured by the Senate Committee on Appropriations this morning that it would be attended to in a forthcoming bill.

I ask a vote on the motion I have made.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HITT to concur in the Senate amendments, it was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HITT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think, Mr. Chairman, that I have fully explained the provisions of the bill——

Mr. DOCKERY. Before the gentleman concludes, there is a point to which I wish to ask his attention.

I understand that the report of the Attorney-General, to which he refers, is to the effect that the Ogden Land Company has some title.

Mr. SHERMAN. I so understand.

Mr. DOCKERY. Under the act of March 2, 1895, the Secretary of the Interior was authorized to enter upon negotiations for the purchase of the land?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOCKERY. Now, then, this paragraph in the bill and the report of the Attorney-General simply raise the question as to the propriety of the United States making the purchase. In other words, it is a legislative provision submitted for the consideration of this body, and if no point of order is interposed of course the body will consider it on its merits.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is not susceptible to the point of order. It is in furtherance of former legislation.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, we will see the gentleman about that later on. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Well, if that is to be insisted on, I would like to say a word to my friend from New York. I understand that there are some 50,000 acres of this land owned by these Indians in the State of New York, and worth probably $100 an acre.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; worth about $50 an acre.

Mr. CANNON. Well, away back before the formation of the Constitution of the United States there was some arrangement made with these Indians and the Ogden Land Company, I believe.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; it was after the adoption of the Constitution. I have a statement here. If the gentleman cares to have me make it, I can show him what the title has been right down through from the time it was owned by the aborigines until now.

Mr. CANNON. Well, it seems to me that if this is to be insisted on—although I must say I think it is subject to a point of order—if it is to be insisted upon, it seems to me the more information we have about it the better.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend from Illinois will permit me, I expected at the time this item was reached in the bill to give a full explanation about it, much more full, of course, than I am giving now. I did not intend to say anything about this provision except in a general way, any more than I did about any other provision of the bill. I have said all I care to say, Mr. Chairman, in explanation of the bill. One or two members of the committee desire to take part in the general debate, and I should like to fix a limit to the general debate.

Mr. CONNOLLY. This is a proposition, as I understand, to appropriate $250,000 for the purpose of extinguishing a lien upon these lands. Is that the proposition?

Mr. SHERMAN. To buy the title, whatever that title may be.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I find that in the last Congress an arrangement was made for the purpose of ascertaining what that lien was.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. CONNOLLY. What it amounted to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. CONNOLLY. That was referred to the United States attorney for the northern district of New York eight months ago.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. CONNOLLY. No report seems to have been had yet.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand that whatever report the United States district attorney made he made but a short time ago, and that the Department have made their report this morning. I have not seen it, but will simply state that I understand the report to be that there is a title in the Ogden Land Company. Certainly if there is no title in the Ogden Land Company, if I am mistaken about that, then this item may go out on my motion.

Mr. PEARSON. Before the gentleman takes his seat, I should like to ask him if he can give the committee any information as to how much money would be required to procure, either by lease or purchase, the school buildings that are now used in these contract schools?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say to my friend from North Carolina that I do not know whether these buildings can be procured at all or not. I presume some of them could not be had. I imagine that to erect school buildings which would take the place of all these contract schools would require perhaps from a million and a half to two millions of dollars.

Mr. PEARSON. The gentleman knows that we have already acquired certain of the schools?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. PEARSON. And we have acquired them from nearly every denomination except one?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. PEARSON. Now, has any effort been made looking to the obtaining of the title to such schools, either by lease or otherwise?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think not; but I will say to my friend that I have an idea, obtained from a semiofficial source, that these schools perhaps would not be sold to the United States, and to erect schools to take their places would involve appropriations running somewhere from one to two millions of dollars, I should suppose.

Mr. GAMBLE. Anticipating that such an interrogatory might be propounded, I had occasion to confer with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and submitted to him this proposition:

> If all contracts by the Government with sectarian or other schools were at this time terminated, what appropriation of money by the Government would be necessary to construct or purchase suitable buildings and sites, with equipments, to adequately and sufficiently supply the service equal to that before the discontinuance of any of the contract schools under the law of 1895?

That was before there was any reduction in the general appropriation bill. To that the following response was given:

> If the contract-school system were abolished and the Government forced to care for the 4,000 children now being educated therein, it would require at least 20 boarding-school plants with capacity for 200 pupils each. To construct and equip these plants would cost not less than $60,000 each, or a total of $1,200,000. This estimate is based upon the actual expenses of this office in constructing such schools.

That answers the interrogatory of the gentleman.

Mr. SHERMAN. That answers very clearly the interrogatory which I answered in a very general way.

Mr. HERMANN. If the chairman of the committee will permit me a moment, as I did not have the pleasure of listening to his opening statement or general explanation of the bill, I desire to ask him whether he has touched upon a very grave subject now troubling the Interior Department in the government of the Indians as to the administration of the lands which have been allotted and set apart to them in severalty. Under the laws, as now construed, those lands are not subject to taxation and will not be until the end of twenty-five years, during which they are under the control of the General Government, and at the expiration of which the title will be in the Indians. In the meantime, however, improvements are made on these lands, within the limits of these allotted lands, and yet I state it as a fact that the county and State authorities have no power to levy an assessment and collect any taxes upon them. I wanted to know whether the honorable gentleman in the statement of his bill has touched upon that point.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill does not touch upon that matter.

Mr. HERMANN. Then I will offer an amendment so as to bring the matter up during the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would like to know of my colleague, Mr. WILSON, how much time he desires to occupy?

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I should think about forty minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all general debate on the bill be closed in one hour and thirty minutes, at 3.30, one hour to be given to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE] and forty minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. LITTLE. I suggest to the chairman that the time be not limited, as other gentlemen may want to participate, as the debate has begun.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, we will have ample opportunity while the bill is being considered under the five-minute rule.

Mr. LITTLE. I have no objection personally.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I ask unanimous consent that general debate be closed at half past 3 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that general debate upon this bill be closed at half past 3. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered by the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield for an hour to my colleague, Mr. LITTLE.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, one year ago I had the honor of addressing myself to the condition of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, which adjoins my State upon the west. At that time I tried in my humble way to make known to Congress and the country the conditions that existed there, which, in my opinion, demanded the prompt and speedy action of Congress.

As to the bill under consideration, its provisions, in the main, meet my approval; but I can think of no better place or time than upon the consideration of this bill to give my ideas of what should be the course of the Government toward these people. Back more than thirty years ago the Government guaranteed to the Five Civilized Tribes by treaty a government of a republican form, to be administered by themselves. The conditions that surrounded that country at that time no longer exist. Then they were an isolated people. Now the conditions are entirely changed. Upon the east is the populous and progressive State that I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor; south and west of it is the empire State of Texas, and west and north of it are the States of Colorado and of Kansas.

In this Territory there are Indians to the number of 50,055, members of the respective Five Tribes, or five self-called sovereignties of that Territory. There also lives in the Territory a colored population amounting to 18,636; also, there is a population of white people, excluding that number who are termed intruders, approximately more than 300,000 people. These Indian governments, that were intended to be isolated, have been unable to meet the resistless force and power of the progress of civilization. Its walls have been broken down and great railroads have been built through its territory. Young cities are springing up all over that country, without government and without any protection for the people.

The Government also supplies that country with a postal service, having, I believe, more than 300 post-offices in that Territory. There are 40,142 square miles embraced within its domain. There is much of it rich and fertile soil and of unlimited resources in point of mineral wealth—coal abounds in unlimited quantities. These lands originally were given by treaty to the tribes, not to the individual Indians, but given to the tribes to be held by them for the use and benefit of the members of the tribe, each of them to share and share alike in its blessings and in its profits; but, sir, to-day, when we look at that country, we witness a different spectacle. As I had the honor to announce in my former speech, and I reiterate it and defy contradiction, there is one tribe alone owning 3,000,000 acres, where 61 of its citizens have in their possession over 1,250,000 acres of land that is of right the common heritage of these people. This condition exists more or less in all these tribes. These are largely whites, or men in whose veins white blood predominates, many of them adopted citizens by marriage. They have absorbed the country to the detriment of the people to whom the United States guaranteed it in their treaties; and these same people, when you talk about changing their form of government, at once call your attention to the sacredness of these treaties.

I had not intended to discuss at length at this time that branch of the question, but to call the attention of this House to the fact of the absolute necessity of the strong arm of the Government being stretched out over that people in order to protect, not only property, but human life. In 1892 the Senate sent a committee to that country headed by Hon. HENRY M. TELLER, a Senator from Colorado. That commission reported the conditions existing there, and urged the necessity of Congress speedily dealing with the question, not only for the protection of human life, but for the protection of the Indians in their property rights. Later on, in 1893, I think, what is commonly known as the Dawes commission was organized, consisting of ex-Senator Henry M. Dawes, A. S. McKennon, and Major Kidd. They went to that country and spent a year within its boundaries. They talked to its plain people, they talked to the Indians, they talked to the colored population, they informed themselves of the conditions as they existed, and they reported those conditions to Congress. They urged that it was necessary, in order not only to secure the rights of these Indian people, but to protect the lives and families of the law-abiding white citizens in that Territory, that Congress should act promptly.

The delegations claiming to represent these tribes made war upon that report and denounced it as false. They went to the President of the United States with charges that Major Kidd, of that commission, was especially prejudiced against the Indians, and asked the appointment of another. The President, in response to that appeal, willing to give them every possible showing, had Major Kidd transferred to another department and substituted in his stead General Armstrong. General Armstrong, born in the Indian country, his life almost spent in that service, was put on the commission at the special request of the Indians as their friend, as a man in whose judgment and wisdom they could trust. Ex-Congressmen Cabaniss and Montgomery, with whom gentlemen here are well acquainted, were also added to the commission.

Every one of these gentlemen went upon that commission prejudiced in favor of the position that had been assumed by the representatives of the Five Tribes; they have confessed it openly and will confess it now. They went on that commission believing that the Dawes report was a mistake, that it was made with a wrong idea of the then existing conditions. They visited that country by direction of the President and spent considerable time there. They endeavored to negotiate with these people to improve the existing conditions, and they came back not only indorsing the former reports, but saying that the condition of things in that Territory were far worse than as described in that report, and they urged upon Congress the most radical legislation looking to the uprooting of these little tribunals and governments in that Territory that are upheld by the strong arm of fear and by public plunder.

They found the fact to be that the little Indian courts there, intended for the protection of the people, had become machines to intimidate and rob them. Thus we have these three unanimous reports made by men who have gone and investigated the situation on the ground, and as Senator Dawes said this morning in a speech before the Committee on Indian Affairs, either these reports are correct or the men who represented the Government upon these several commissions were ignorant or dishonest, and I think no man can well question that proposition. Of the men who are sent here to represent these Indian tribes I know many personally. I have no quarrel with them. They are prompted only by that law which rules the human heart and which so operates that when you get your hand into the public crib somebody else will have to take it out other than yourself. [Laughter.] These little Indian governments are ruled and maintained by the men who have that country in control, not by the common Indian. He is off in the valleys or upon the mountain sides.

In this connection I want to read a statement, made by the head of the delegation, showing how the great chief of the Cherokee Nation respects the findings of the honorable men who went out there as Commissioners to represent this Government and, after proper investigation, made their report to Congress. In a letter to the New York Sun, under date of January 22, 1896, he says:

> The Dawes Commission visited the Indian Territory last year, remained at comfortable hotels on the railroads where noncitizens reside and control the business, and the newspapers published there took the statements of our enemies and made a report containing statements wholly at variance with the truth. They picture us as a lawless band of robbers, corrupt in every department, which I desire to brand as a lie "as false as h—l."
> Thanking you again in behalf of the Five Tribes in the Indian Territory,
> S. H. MAYES,
> Principal Chief, Cherokee Nation.
> WASHINGTON, January 22, 1896.

This is the polished language of the chief of one of these great governments we are asked to maintain. This is the character of the arguments with which he meets the statements of these public officials whose lives are known to be without blemish and whose abilities have been acknowledged throughout the nation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no contest with this great chief, but I propose to introduce witnesses to this Congress who will not only vindicate the reports of these Commissioners, but will show that they have not told half the truth. I announce it here as a fact that since the 4th day of last March, when Congress adjourned, there have been, approximately, 280 murders committed within the boundaries of that Territory. That number may not strike gentlemen here very forcibly, but it is a regiment of people who, in one Territory, in less time than one year, have gone down in death either in personal conflict or by the assassin's bullet. If I desired to occupy your time I could name 260 of these victims, names culled from the various newspaper reports, taking no account of the great number of cases in that country that never find their way to the newspapers, making an aggregate approximating—I do not know how to approximate it, but, to say the least of it, a number appalling to every man who respects social order, the rights of property, and the sacredness of human life.

I read now from the Teller report, page 12, and I wish that members desiring information upon this subject would secure this document. It is Senate report 377, second session Fifty-third Congress:

Instances came to our notice of Indians who had as high as 100 tenants, and we heard of one case where it was said the Indian citizen, a citizen by marriage, had 400 holdings, amounting to about 20,000 acres of farm land. We believe that may be an exceptional case, but that individual Indians have large numbers of tenants on land not subdued and put into cultivation by the Indian, but by his white tenant, and that these holdings are not for the benefit of the whole people but of the few enterprising ones, is admitted by all. The monopoly is so great that in the most wealthy and progressive tribe your committee were told that 100 persons had appropriated fully one-half of the best land. This class of citizens take the very best agricultural lands and leave the poorer land to the less enterprising citizens, who in many instances farm only a few acres in the districts farthest removed from the railroads and the civilized centers.

As we have said, the title to these lands is held by the tribe in trust for the people. We have shown that this trust is not being properly executed, nor will it be if left to the Indians, and the question arises, What is the duty of the Government of the United States with reference to this trust? While we have recognized these tribes as dependent nations, the Government has likewise recognized its guardianship over the Indians and its obligations to protect them in their property and personal rights.

The treaty and the patents under which these people hold title convey the land to the tribe for the common benefit of all the Indians, share and share alike.

Mr. KEM. Does the gentleman know how many of these persons whom he speaks of as Indians are not Indians in fact, but merely such by marriage into the tribe?

Mr. LITTLE. I do not. There is quite a number, however, of that class. They are not only a large class, but an influential class.

Mr. KEM. Are they not the class of people with whom most of this trouble originates?

Mr. LITTLE. As to this land trouble, yes, sir; they and the progressive mixed bloods. I will come to other troubles directly.

Mr. KEM. Is not the land trouble at the bottom of all the other troubles to a great extent?

Mr. LITTLE. I think that the land trouble contributes largely to the difficulty. But there are a number of other causes in operation. The real trouble, let me say to my friend, is that there is no common government over this country; there is no uniform system of laws; there is no flag to which the American citizen or the Indian can look for common protection.

Whether the chief to whom I have referred calls that manner of appropriation of lands which belong to all the people of his tribe in common robbery or legitimate speculation, I leave him to decide. I will only say if it is honest for one citizen, either by blood or adoption, to acquire a large number of separate holdings in this way when many other members of the tribe are deprived of a home—if that be honest, then I have been erroneously taught as to what honesty is.

We believe that may be an exceptional case—

This refers to that case of a single individual holding 100 farms.

Mr. KEM. Will the gentleman permit me a moment right here? Do not the Indians have some sort of government or laws of their own?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEM. Does not their law prohibit this sort of holding?

Mr. LITTLE. No, sir. They claim the right under their laws, in open violation of their treaties——

Mr. KEM. Then this is one cause of dissatisfaction on the part of the Indians?

Mr. LITTLE. Dissatisfaction arises because of the fact that these men who are in control of the government have possession of these large quantities of property to which they are not entitled; and by their influence, I may say by threats, by intimidation, by the free use of money, they are enabled to control the government there absolutely, and do so in open violation of the rights of their own people.

Mr. KEM. When the gentleman speaks of "these men" he means men who have married into the Indian tribes.

Mr. LITTLE. Not altogether; in part; but also the progressive class of Indians, mostly of the mixed blood.

Mr. KEM. I understood the gentleman to say that those were the class of men that used or ruled the government.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; in connection with the progressive class of Indians. The men who control the landed interests of the government control the government.

Mr. KEM. Your theory, then, is that the Indian is not capable of governing himself?

Mr. LITTLE. He is not able to do so alone; but the Government can aid him. His government has passed out of his hands and gone into the hands of these merciless speculators.

Mr. KEM. Well, he is not capable of establishing or organizing a government for himself.

Mr. LITTLE. No; but this Government is capable of giving him a government along with the white people who live there. A large number of the Indians are individually capable of self-government; but there is this little, weak, trembling organization of five sovereignties in one Territory, enabling certain rulers to control the conditions absolutely and to rule the ordinary Indian by inspiring his prejudice against any progressive movement looking to the recognition of the rights of all the people. The gentleman will hear from me further on that point when I reach other lines in the argument.

Mr. KEM. Will the gentleman permit another inquiry?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes, sir; I am glad the gentleman is seeking information.

Mr. KEM. I am seeking information, and I want to ascertain whether the great difficulty, as I said awhile ago, does not arise, after all, from these white men who have married into the Indian tribes and are Indians only by virtue of the law.

Mr. LITTLE. But there are plenty of Indians among those five tribes that are as intelligent as anybody. Many of these, as well as the white adopted citizens, have managed by their shrewdness to outwit their companions; they have got that country fenced up in a large measure so that the Indians can not obtain the land to which they are entitled. Take the instance which I cited a few moments ago, where 61 of these leading men hold more than 1,000,000 acres of land under fence. They are collecting rent for those lands and putting the money into their own pockets, while it is the duty of the Government to see that the Indians of the tribe at large, who are the wards of the Government, shall enjoy not only the country but its products. I protest against permitting a few men to absorb the wealth that belongs to the Indians of that country. This defenseless people must be rescued from the corruption and tyranny of these petty governments or else we must permit the treaties intended for their protection to be made the instruments of their oppression.

Mr. TALBERT. As to the evils which you complain of, do you seek to remedy them by amending this bill or must it be done by other legislation?

Mr. LITTLE. We propose to do it by other legislation pending before the proper committees of the House.

Mr. TALBERT. Not in this bill?

Mr. LITTLE. No; by independent legislation.

Mr. KEM. I trust the gentleman will inform us as he goes on what remedies he proposes.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes, sir; I will do so; or, if I should omit it, I trust the gentleman will remind me of it at the conclusion of my remarks. But I might say here that there should be an independent and impartial tribunal established to determine the rights of citizenship in these tribes. Provision should be made for surveying and laying out town sites and affording a government for the towns. The lands should be allotted in severalty to the Indians, guarded by judicious legislation, and a territorial government should be at once established suited to the conditions there, efficient and strong enough to maintain the peace and order of that country.

I now read from the same report, and upon the same page:

It is apparent to all who are conversant with the present condition in the Indian Territory that their system of government can not continue. It is not only non-American, but it is radically wrong, and a change is imperatively demanded in the interest of the Indian and whites alike, and such change can not be much longer delayed. The situation grows worse and will continue to grow worse. There can be no modification of the system. It can not be reformed. It must be abandoned and a better one substituted. That it will be difficult to do your committee freely admit, but because it is a difficult task is no reason why Congress should not at the earliest possible moment address itself to this question.

This is the language of Senator TELLER, chairman of the committee, who went personally and viewed the existing conditions in that country, and the entire committee give this as their deliberate judgment.

Mr. KEM. Now, in that connection, is it your opinion or do you know whether the majority of these Indians are favorable to the change suggested there?

Mr. LITTLE. My opinion is that the majority of them, surrounded as they are, claim to oppose to it. I know that many of them favor the change and would to-day openly revolt against their tribal government, but are held back through fear and intimidation.

Mr. KEM. But are the majority opposed to the change in the landholding system—these large holdings?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes, sir; I have no doubt of it.

Mr. KEM. Well, the object of this proposition, as I understand it, is to get matters arranged so that this change could be made with reference to the Indians.

Mr. LITTLE. Certainly; and put the lands where they belong—under the treaty stipulations.

Mr. KEM. Let me proceed a moment with my question. And you say that the Indians object to the large holding?

Mr. LITTLE. Certainly.

Mr. KEM. Why, then, do they not agree to the Dawes proposition, which seems to be in accord with their sentiment?

Mr. LITTLE. There is a difference between the Indians and the official rulers of the governments there in reference to what is the proper thing to be done. The big men, as they call them, tell the poor full-blood that the Government wants to steal their country, and the poor creature believes and consents to their further extortions and robberies.

Mr. KEM. But I am talking now of what we ought to do and what the Indians want to do themselves. I understand that they favor doing away with these land holdings, which have become very objectionable, as you say, and yet that a majority are opposed to the Dawes proposition to do the very thing which they are in favor of.

Mr. LITTLE. So far, let me say to the gentleman, as there has been an open expression of opinion concerning this matter, I think it is the fact that the majority are opposed to any radical change in the governments; and, mind you, an Indian in that country, a member of one of these tribes, who advocates or petitions any officer or any country or any government outside of his own tribe does so at his own risk, really at the peril of his life, and several of the tribes have passed laws making it treason for any one of their number to advocate the allotment or the change of their land tenures.

Mr. KEM. That has been done, then, by the Indians themselves?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; by the Indians themselves.

Mr. KEM. And done through their own governments?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes, sir; by their own governments, and they are the governments of which I am speaking, that ought not to be allowed to exist for a moment.

Mr. KEM. Has there ever been an expression on the part of the Indians in such a way as to indicate the true sentiment of the Indians—the majority of them—with reference to their wishes in regard to this matter?

Mr. LITTLE. None, except through their national councils, and they have been as much against this as you might expect, and they will continue to be against it. It is a condition that exists among them, and to one who is not familiar with the character of the Indian it would be difficult to explain the reason why. But it is a condition that Congress ought to give time and attention to at once, and correct these evils and this great injustice to these people, who are the wards of the Government.

I read now from page 17 of the last report of the commission appointed to negotiate with these Indians, which appears in Senate Document No. 12, first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress:

If the end of government and the administration of justice is the protection of the life and liberty and property of the citizen, then the governments and courts of these nations are a failure, for they afford that protection to neither. They are powerless to these ends, and the victims of this misrule are helpless sufferers at the mercy of the malign influences which dominate every department and branch of the governments as administered here. It matters little, except as to the character of the remedy, whether this failure and misrule arises from impotence or willful and corrupt purpose, the evil consequences are incalculable and its continuance unjustifiable. It is no less true now than when the commission reported last year that "all of the functions of the so-called governments of these five tribes have become utterly unable to protect the life or property rights of the citizen. Their courts of justice have become powerless and paralyzed. Violence, robbery, and murder have become almost of daily occurrence, and no effective measures of restraint or punishment are put forth by these governments and courts to suppress crime. Railroad trains continue to be stopped and their passengers robbed in the very presence of those in authority. A reign of terror exists, and barbarous outrages almost impossible of belief are enacted, and the perpetrators hardly find it necessary to shun daily intercourse with their victims."

The United States district court at Fort Smith, Ark., has been given jurisdiction in the Indian Territory only over crimes committed by an Indian upon a white man or by a white man upon an Indian. Of all crimes committed by Indians upon Indians the Indian courts still have sole jurisdiction. In this limited jurisdiction of the United States court the present able and upright judge has, since his appointment in 1875, sentenced to death on conviction in his court 153 persons, and there are to-day in the United States jail at Fort Smith under sentence of death appealed on questions of law 26.

I may add that since the publication of this report there are to-day between 30 and 40 murderers in this prison under the same conditions; that is, under sentence of death.

Mr. KEM. But would that not lead to the belief that these offenders were being punished?

Mr. LITTLE. If you will wait you will see fully the exact condition. Of course the Territorial jurisdiction of this court extends over only a part of this country.

Of these, 20 have been convicted the present year, the largest number in any one year. There are now under indictment for murder and awaiting trial 13 others, and several are in jail awaiting examination. There is also a United States court at Paris, Tex., having similar jurisdiction in the Indian Territory, the records of which show that since 1890 there have been 22 sentenced to death for murders committed in the Territory, and there are now under indictment 128, nearly all of whom are eluding arrest. How many murders in addition to these have been committed by Indians upon Indians, of which their courts have exclusive jurisdiction, there is no record available, but there is good reason to believe that they exceed these numbers. Reliable newspapers and individuals who have endeavored to obtain accurate information as to the prevalence of crime in the Territory agree in the statement that up to November 1 there had been 257 murders committed in the Territory since the last adjournment of Congress. Of course there have been many others not thus ascertained. If other crimes have in any degree a proportion to that of murder in the Territory the condition must be appalling, and can not fail to call loudly for a remedy.

I now read from a newspaper published by a citizen of the Indian country at the town of Vinita, known as the Indian Chieftain, and I call the especial attention of my friend to it. This is under date of February 13, 1896. It says:

THE DAWES COMMISSION BILL.

In this issue is printed the Dawes bill, or the bill prepared by the commission that bears the name of the venerable statesman of Massachusetts. It is sweeping in its provisions and will about wipe up the tribal governments in this Territory if it becomes a law. A howl of rage will now go up from monopolists and "Indians for revenue" throughout this country, and the little puny 2 by 4 newspapers that are subsidized by the above-named class will spew their venom far and wide. But the ultimate result will be the same, for Congress will pass this or a similar measure before the summer solstice. There are some things about this proposed Dawes bill that a great many Indian citizens will object to, but there are also many things about the present tribal governments that a great many people object to and are sorely displeased with, so it is at least a stand off in that particular. To recite the causes that have led up to the sending of the Dawes commission here by the United States Government would fill a good-sized book, but that there were causes and sufficient reasons for the action of the United States Government needs no demonstration.

The Dawes bill has been prepared and introduced largely for the benefit of the Indians of this territory, and whether they ever see it that way or not makes very little difference at this stage of the game. Congress could do no wiser thing than send the Dawes commission here with full power and authority to settle the whole thing. Under the provisions of the bill a great, and it may be a dangerous, power is delegated to a few men; but somebody must be clothed with authority sooner or later to do this very thing; and Senator Dawes and his colleagues are better prepared to do it than any like number of men in the United States. If the commission has misrepresented the Indians it has been largely the fault of the Indians themselves in not furnishing them with correct information. The truth is, if the commission had known some things that are true as regards the methods of some of our officials it would have made a report that would have "astonished the natives," for we all know that they didn't tell half that might have been told.

The reason the Government proposes to allot the lands of the Five Tribes is because a few of their citizens are monopolizing the country to the exclusion of the younger and poorer members of the tribe, and they refuse to remedy the evil or curb the monopoly themselves. The cattlemen and the officeholders have "had a picnic" out of this country about long enough, and the Congress of the United States has at last heard the cry of those who have been imposed upon so long, and the day of reckoning is near at hand. The "swan song" of the two classes mentioned will never mislead Congress more, and to make a long story short, the Chieftain, as one whose interest is here alone, and as a citizen whose welfare is inseparable from that of other citizens of the Cherokee Nation, states most emphatically that it is in favor of the Dawes bill, with some few amendments, becoming a law, and would rather trust the notorious and much abused Dawes commission than the Cherokee national council any day in the year.

For years the capital of this nation has been a veritable sink hole of official venality. Citizenship in this nation has been bought openly from mercenary councilors, and occasionally a circuit judge takes a hand in selling out his country. Corruption at Tahlequah has assumed every form that will yield plunder, and good citizens have stood aghast at the saturnalia of corruption that is apparent on all sides. The boodlers have from time to time pooled their issues in the great spoils, and the courts, along with the council, have been perverted for money, and the channel of justice turned into cesspools of bribery and a menace to the liberties of the people and a travesty upon jurisprudence. Last session of the national council witnessed the sad spectacle of a judge of one of the largest circuits in the Cherokee country accepting money from claimants to citizenship, and sneaking around and buying votes of senators and councilors enough to secure their admission to citizenship, and at the same time pocketing a five-hundred-dollar fee himself. Shame! Shame! And yet men of this ilk tell us the country is safe, and that the Dawes commission has been guilty of unpardonable mendacity.

Mr. Chairman, it is refreshing to find a man, whether a citizen by blood or adoption, who has the courage to speak the truth about his own government and people. This is a paper published in that nation by a citizen making these declarations in the very teeth of these people, and they have stood undenied up to this time.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. LITTLE. Certainly.

Mr. PICKLER. Is it the gentleman's intention to discuss the removal of the "intruders"?

Mr. LITTLE. Not particularly on this occasion. I am addressing myself to the large number of whites, some 250,000, who are not embraced in the class known as intruders.

Mr. PICKLER. In the last Congress this matter of the removal of the intruders came up again. The Government has several times fixed a date for the removal of these intruders, as the Indians call these white men.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. PICKLER. I should like to know whether the Government has done anything to carry out that, and whether these Indians in the Indian Territory do not make as an excuse for not acceding to the request of the Dawes commission that the Government does not carry out its agreement as to putting these intruders out of the Territory, as it has long promised the Indians to do?

Mr. LITTLE. I shall be glad to address myself to that after I have finished this, if my time has not expired. I now send to the Clerk's desk to have read an article, published by a native Cherokee Indian, addressed to the Muldrow Register. That will shed some light upon the question which the gentleman asked me.

The Clerk read as follows:

A CHEROKEE INDIAN ON MONOPOLY.

[T. D. Lee in Muldrow Register.]

I wish to say something through your paper to my dear Cherokee people, the full bloods and the half-breeds who have no land nor no homes here in their own country. The intruder question is a big thing and making a good deal of noise. We are told that the intruders are all to be put out after January.

That's all right, and good as far as it goes, but what is it likely to amount to? The monopolists have it all figured out to bid in the intruders' improvements, so that won't make it any better for Cherokees who have no land.

Some of our leaders make a great fuss and blow about the intruders robbing the poor Indians of their lands, when they know as well as any body that some of our own people are robbing us a good deal worse—even ten to one—those fellows who are "Indians for revenue only," many being white men who have married Cherokee women and white Injuns. A few of this kind of people have gobbled up most of the best land in this nation, fenced it in with wire, and pasture many thousands of Texas cattle at big profit, and pay not a cent of taxes on the land.

This class of people, who are called Cherokee citizens, rob us of ten times as much land as the intruders. Now, if we are robbed in this way what's the difference who robs us? This everlasting talk of putting out the intruders, and then doing nothing, is getting so old and stale it makes me tired to hear it. Better say less and do something. If the bosses want to help the people why don't they handle those robbers who come under Cherokee laws and make them give up those many thousand acres that belong to others? There has been lots of talk about doing this, but it has never been done. It appears that the cattlemen and the "Indians for revenue only" have too much money to have any such thing happen.

Some of those fellows who are making such noise about putting out the intruder robbers have robbed their own people worse than the intruder, and were the cause of getting many of the intruders into this country as a money-making scheme. This can't be denied. Before we make such a howl about the intruder robber let us sweep our own dooryard.

I see no good for the poor Cherokees in putting out the intruders if our rich men are to buy up their places. Just as well let the intruders stay here. The best way I can see out of this difficulty we are in is for all the land to be divided between the Cherokee people, so that each person may have what belongs to them, and no more. Then the intruders would have to go, and the land robbers give up what didn't belong to them. This would bring our home robbers to time and others also.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, it will be seen by this article that if the so-called intruders are put out their improvements will be sold and bought by the same men who now have the country in their hands. It will add much to their holding, but the homeless Indian and colored citizen will be in no wise benefited.

Mr. Chairman, I now desire to have read a petition of 520 native Cherokee Indians, all Indians by blood or adoption of that tribe, which was presented at the last national council of that nation and received no consideration, and which gave to them no beneficial results. I ask the Clerk to omit the names, there being so many that I can not consume the time of the House in having them read, but permit me to say that I find among the names the brother of this chief who so bitterly attacks the commission.

The Clerk read as follows:

PETITION.

TO THE HONORABLE COUNCIL OF THE CHEROKEE NATION: We, the undersigned citizens, beg leave to call your attention to the deplorable and unsatisfactory condition of our public domain—with which you are familiar—and ask that you enact such law or laws as will correct this condition. A portion of our citizens through the connivance and financial assistance of noncitizens have managed to monopolize our entire public domain, under various pretenses of law. Thousands of our citizens are to-day without homes, and there is no land left upon which they can make homes. Our entire country is wired in, and anyone desiring to travel across the country a few miles is necessarily forced to go, in many instances, 10 miles around in order to reach a place only 3 or 4 miles away. In most places in the nation the noncitizens on land claims outnumber the citizens, west of Grand River, in Cooweescoowee and Delaware districts, it is the exception to the rule to find a citizen on a claim; the noncitizens will outnumber them 100 to 1. There is nothing thought of one man in this portion of country claiming from five to twenty farms. And in most instances these farms perhaps consist of 10 acres in cultivation and from one to five thousand acres in grass land for hay to cut and ship out of the country for speculation. These noncitizens claim to be leasing this land from citizens. And in most instances when a noncitizen once gets to be a leaseholder he then commences to lease to other noncitizens on his own account. Hundreds of leases are held by noncitizens emanating from another noncitizen. Thus our entire public domain is absorbed, and they even go so far as to sell the unfenced quarter for hay purposes for shipment. This condition of affairs has been productive of a great hardship to a large portion of our citizens; they realize that they are entirely deprived of homes and privileges on the public domain, while the few citizens, together with noncitizens, are monopolizing all of their rights. Even hay and wood are denied them.

Heretofore we have endeavored through our councilors and senators to obtain relief, but so far these land monopolists have been able to thwart us in our design and with money have defeated us in this our right. We are perfectly aware of the fact that these transactions with noncitizens are without the semblance of law to protect them under the Government. And the courts of the United States in this Territory have decided that they have no status under the Arkansas statutes. The Interior Department has long since decided that even our council had no right to lease land. And surely such a right can not be delegated to a citizen.

In view of all these things, we, as law-abiding citizens, once more ask for relief at your hands. We view our own council as the proper place to make our wants known and obtain redress for our wrongs. And we trust that our appeal will not be in vain.

We are fully determined to have redress. We can no longer suffer our rights and the rights of our families to be trampled upon by monopolists and ignored by our officers. We ask you for relief once more, and trust you will not ignore our request. We would regret very much to be driven to the necessity of appealing to the United States Government for relief, but the duty we owe ourselves, our wives, and children will impel us to this course as a last resort to obtain our rights. We ask your consideration of this subject at this assembling of council; and if not complied with this petitition will surely be forwarded to the Congress of the United States, asking them for the relief our own government has for many years steadily refused us.

We, your petitioners, will ever pray.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I now desire to read from a personal petition which I received from 40 citizens residing in and near the town of Antlers, in the Choctaw Nation:

We, the undersigned residents of the Choctaw Nation, do by these presents represent to your honor the deplorable condition of affairs in this Indian country. One of our neighbors, a worthy young man, was foully murdered by two full-blood Indians, and many threats against the white people of murdering and violence are to be heard upon every hand. Even one Choctaw preacher is now openly advocating a war of extermination of the white men, and we sincerely believe, from this murder that has just occurred at our door and their maneuvering, that they fully intend to carry out these threats; that under the present state of affairs here there is neither protection to life nor property. Therefore we sincerely beg of you that you urge Congress to give us a different form of government that will at least give us some protection for our lives. We are peaceable and by consent and invitation of these Indians hold leases.

I will state at this point that these are farmers who hold farms which they have leased from citizens of the nation.

We have always observed their laws and paid our permits, and now feel justified in demanding at least some protection from the United States Government. A martial law would be far preferable to the present farce of law.

I will read at this point a description of the murder referred to in this petition. It shows that it does not grow out of personal enmity or malice, but out of race prejudice:

MURDERED BY CHOCTAW BOYS—LEE CRUMM SHOT, SCALPED, AND OTHERWISE MUTILATED, AND THEN ROBBED.

Lee Crumm, white, was murdered 2 miles from here by two Choctaw boys, aged 12 and 16. They shot him on Sunday, injuring him badly. On Monday they went back, scalped him while still alive, and cut off his ears. Then they cut his throat, gouged out his eyes, slashing his cheeks, and robbed his dead body. When arrested both confessed, explaining that United States laws were no good, and that they had decided to kill a white man.

This petition and the peculiar character of this tragedy warn us, Mr. Chairman, that there is a ceaseless conflict going on in this country—one that I firmly believe will result in open warfare before the close of this year, if Congress neglects to take aggressive steps to prevent it. They prefer martial law to present conditions, and I agree with them, for if these conditions continue it will take a standing army to keep the peace.

Now, I also desire to call attention to a murder committed only a few weeks ago, simply to give some indication of the general character of these crimes, between two and three hundred of which have occurred in this territory in one year. This occurred within a few miles of the border:

DOUBLE MURDER NEAR MULDROW.

Rev. Lacey Laskey, a full-blood Cherokee preacher, and another Indian, named Mack Glass, were shot and killed by some unknown persons last Friday night at the home of Mr. Laskey, about 10 miles northeast of this place, when James Laskey, a son of the preacher, was also shot, and is reported in a critical condition. The parties who came in for the coffins on Saturday report that the killing was done by two men, supposed to be Indians, who are still at large.

It appears that the motive of the killing was robbery. Glass, who was reported to have quite a sum of money, was met by the two men, who demanded his money. He told them that his money was at Mr. Laskey's house, to which the parties went. While searching the house for the money Mr. Laskey, his son, and Glass made resistance, which resulted in the shooting and killing. One of the robbers was shot, but how bad is not known. He dropped his gun and left it where it fell. Mr. Laskey was highly esteemed among all classes.

Mr. PICKLER. Now, Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman know whether or not these whites who were murdered were of this intruder class?

Mr. LITTLE. They were not—not the ones concerning whom I have read.

Mr. PICKLER. In that petition you have read you say that the Indians have taken the law into their own hands. Are not they there referring to the intruders, as they are termed.

Mr. LITTLE. No, sir. This refers to white people who are there lawfully at the invitation of the Choctaws and comply with their laws.

Mr. PICKLER. I fully agree that some other kind of government ought to be given there. The United States must furnish a government. But I would like to hear the gentleman, if he has any information, as he in all probability has, with reference to the removal of the intruders. He will remember that Congress provided that these intruders—these white men that have gone in there—should be removed, and that Congress provided for their removal March, 1894. Now, they were not removed. The Government failed to remove them in accordance with its treaty with the Indians; and in the last Congress we extended the time, saying that these intruders might remain there until January 1, 1895. Now, I want to know what the Government has done to carry out the treaty with these Indians; and if it has not done anything, if that is not a source largely of the trouble in the Indian Territory—that these Indians claim that the Government will not remove these intruders as they have agreed to do—and that they have now taken the law into their own hands, and if the present Administration is not to be criticised for not carrying out these laws.

Mr. LITTLE. The Government did agree to put out that class of people known as intruders, when it was ascertained how this agreement was being abused, and that it was about to result in great wrong to many thousands of people. The Secretary declined to enforce the order until Congress had an opportunity to establish an impartial tribunal to determine who were intruders; and I most heartily commend him for it. He acted with justice and humanity. I submit the following extract from the last report of the commission, at pages 15 and 16, which fully justifies the course of the Secretary:

CHEROKEE CITIZENSHIP.

Citizenship in these nations has been left by the National Government entirely under the control of the authorities in the several existing governments.

The citizenship roll of the Cherokees has dealt with a larger number than any of the others, affecting, as it does, all North Carolina Cherokees who desire to become a part of the nation, and a more liberal policy of adoption by intermarriage and otherwise than exists in the other tribes.

A tribunal was established many years ago for determining the right of admission to this roll, and it was made up at that time by judicial decision in each case. Since that time and since the administration of public affairs has fallen into present hands, this roll has become a political football, and names have been stricken from it and added to it and restored to it without notice or rehearing or power of review, to answer political or personal ends and with entire disregard of rights affected thereby. Many who have long enjoyed all the acknowledged rights of citizenship have, without warning, found themselves thus decitizenized and deprived both of political and property rights pertaining to such citizenship.

This practice of striking names from the rolls has been used in criminal cases to oust courts of jurisdiction depending on that fact, and the same names have been afterwards restored to the roll when that fact would oust another court of jurisdiction of the same offense. Glaring instances of the entire miscarriage of prosecutions from this cause have come to the knowledge of the commission, and cases of the greatest hardship affecting private rights are of frequent occurrence. This practice is persisted in in defiance of an expressed opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States forwarded to this nation on a case presented that it was not in their power to thus decitizenize one who has been made a citizen by this tribunal clothed by law with the authority. There is no remedy but an interference of the United States.

The "intruders' roll" is being manipulated in the same way. This "intruders' roll" is the list of persons whose claim to citizenship is denied by the nation, and who, by the agreement in the purchase of the "Cherokee Strip," the United States are to remove from the Territory by the 1st of January next. This roll is now being prepared for that purpose by the Cherokee authorities in a manner most surprising and shocking to every sense of justice, and in disregard of the plainest principles of law. The chief assumes to have authority to "designate" the names to be put upon the intruders' roll, and names are, by his order, without hearing or notice, transferred from the citizens' roll to that of intruders, so that, on January 1, 1896, the United States will be called upon to remove from the Territory, by force if need be, thousands of residents substantially selected for that purpose by the chief of the nation. It has been made clear to the commission that the grossest injustice and fraud characterize this roll.

Persons whose names have been upon the citizens' roll by the judicial decree of the tribunal established by law for that purpose for many years, some of them for twenty or more, persons who have enjoyed all the rights of citizens, unquestioned by anyone until distribution per capita of the strip money, have been by the mere "designation" of the chief stricken from the citizens' roll and put upon that of intruders, with notice to quit before January next. Children of such parents, born in the nation, now of age, with families and homes of their own, are receiving this notice to leave forever all they have earned and the homes they have built for themselves, and this at the will of the chief alone. If the United States Government removes such persons it will become a participant in this fraud and injustice, for which ignorance alone can form any excuse. The commission feel it a duty to call attention to these facts and invoke the direct intervention of the Government to prevent the consummation of this great wrong.

Mr. PICKLER. Is not that made an excuse?

Mr. LITTLE. That is the excuse of the Cherokees.

Mr. PICKLER. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. It is not the excuse of any of the others. Now, I want to give you the history of a gang of outlaws that prospered in that country for ten days. I do this with great regret, because it is no pleasure to depict this condition; but I want to impress upon Congress the absolute necessity of preserving the right, the integrity, and the virtue of the people of that country.

Mr. PICKLER. You can not say too much in that direction.

Mr. LITTLE. What I want to do—if I have the power and the ability to do so—is to let this nation know the evil conditions existing there, to the end that people may be inspired to do something to save these people, the Indians and whites, the intruders and nonintruders, all alike. Now, listen to this. None of those that I have read occurred out of the intruder question exclusively. Now I want to speak of the Buck gang, which was fully equal to or worse than any gang that ever existed there, and give a brief history of their crimes which occurred in ten days. The Buck gang sprung up suddenly near Hope Mulligan, and flourished about ten days; but during that ten days they made a criminal record that equaled that of the Dalton gang, or the Starr gang, or the Cook gang, during the length of time they flourished. Now, these three gangs referred to here, in addition to the Buck gang, were lawless marauders, who swept that country with terror, who robbed many people, murdered many people, and robbed trains, until the express companies withdrew from the Territory.

This started Sunday, July 28.

THE RUFUS BUCK GANG—FOUR YOUNG FELLOWS WHO WILL HAVE TO ANSWER FOR RAPE, MURDER, AND ROBBERY.

The Buck gang sprang up suddenly near Ocmulgee, flourished about ten days, and were taken in, but during that ten days they made a criminal record that fades the Dalton gang, the Starr gang, or the Cook gang, considering the length of time they operated.

They started out on Sunday, July 28, by killing a negro deputy marshal at Ocmulgee. Rufus Buck himself is said to have done this job. After this Rufus Buck, Sam Samson, Meoma July, Lucky Davis, and Lewis Davis started out raiding through the country, terrorizing every section they visited. Four of them met Mrs. Wilson, who was moving from one farm to another with two wagons. Her 14-year-old son and a young man who was with her were made to drive on with one wagon, while they kept the woman and the other wagon. They made her get out, and each one of them assaulted her, after which she was allowed to go her way.

Five of them a day or two later went to the house of Mr. Hasson, between Duck and Snake creeks, and after forcing the lady to prepare dinner for them, and partaking of it, all five of the scoundrels assaulted her, tying her down with a rope. They then amused themselves by making Hasson and another man who was present fight each other and dance, shooting around their feet to make them move lively.

They met a man named Shafey on Berryhill Creek, 8 miles from Ocmulgee, robbed him of his horse, saddle, and bridle, $50 in money, and a gold watch. They then discussed the advisability of killing him, and took a vote on it. Three of them voted to let him go, and he was allowed to depart on foot.

They robbed a stock man named Callahan, even taking his boots, and then shot at him, one ball grazing his ear. At the same time they shot a negro boy who was with Callahan. He is said to have since died of his wound.

They visited the home of Gus Chambers, on Duck Creek, 10 miles from Sapulpa, to steal some horses after night. Chambers made a fight, and they filled his house with lead, but hurt no one. They got one horse.

They robbed Norberg's store, near McDermott, and also Orcutt's store, in the same locality. The next day after the Norberg robbery, Capt. Edmund Harry, of the Creek Light Horse, with Light Horsemen Tom Grayson, George Brown, and Skansey, accompanied by Deputy United States Marshals Sam Haynes and N. B. Irvin, run on to the outlaws while they were dividing their plunder, and after a fight in which some 200 shots were fired, all the outlaws surrendered except Lewis Davis, who escaped during the fight. Deputy Marshals Ledbetter, Tolbert, Jones, and Wilson were hot on the trail of the outlaws, and got to the scene of the fight a few minutes after the surrender.

Lynching was freely talked of, and the citizens would certainly have been justified in putting an end to the whole gang; but being assured that the scoundrels would be turned over to Judge Parker's court, the officers were allowed to bring them in alive, and arrived here with them Sunday. They also brought in Albert Stake, who is charged with being implicated in the Garrett murder, but was not with them in the other depredations.

They will be indicted and tried during the present term of court. Buck is part Uche; Samson and July are Indians, while Lucky Davis is a negro.

This gang, Mr. Chairman, in this short period is not only evidence of the outgrowth, but the natural growth of the conditions existing in that country. If I had the power of speech to depict it, I think it could be made so plain that every man would respond to the voice of these commissioners who have gone down there in person and looked into those conditions with a view to correct them. There are, first, five paltry governments claiming to be sovereign in this Territory, held, as I say, together by the power of public plunder. Not only that, but there are within that country 250,000 white people who are not regarded as intruders; who have gone there on the invitation of the Indians, and have leased their lands, paying their permits; who are there to-day without the benefit of law or of schools. And not only that, but 1,500 up to 8,000, the number not known, of a class known as intruders. That is a class that claim to be Cherokee Indians by blood, and that the tribes deny that right. He claims his citizenship, which is denied him, and is therefore classed as an intruder; but no man is classed as an intruder in their country who does not claim to be a citizen. These people Congress by a treaty agreed to put out on the 1st day of January. They declined to do so, the reason for which I explained a moment ago. Whether that is right or not I shall not now further discuss, but I want to go on along this line——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Arkansas be extended until he concludes his argument.

The CHAIRMAN. How much additional time does the gentleman from Arkansas desire?

Mr. LITTLE. Not very much.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for twelve minutes.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Will that extend the time for general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. It will not.

Mr. WASHINGTON. It will in effect, though.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I will modify my request and ask that the time of the gentleman from Arkansas be extended twelve minutes, and also that the time for closing general debate be extended for twelve minutes.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. LITTLE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will read an article from a paper published in the city of Fort Smith, which gives some idea of the conditions prevailing in that country.

Just what this Western country is coming to and what is to be the ultimate result is a thing that puzzles one's mind nowadays. Only a few days since 32 prisoners were taken to the penitentiary at Leavenworth, Kans., and the jail, which had been taxed beyond its capacity, was somewhat relieved. It was thought there would be sufficient room for the remaining ones during the next few weeks, but in this calculation there was a mistake, for every day since the trip to Kansas deputies have arrived with other prisoners, and the number registered on the docket each evening has been steadily increasing. Cells which it was thought would not be used to accommodate more than two people have been made to hold three, and with no prospect of another exodus to the pen for nearly two months the outlook is not promising for the comfort of the inhabitants of Uncle Sam's brick building. Deputies armed with writs have been and are in the saddle and pursuing men for various crimes, and if the record for the past week is maintained there will not be more than room enough in the jail to turn around. On Thursday there were 14 arrivals, on Friday there were 6, and yesterday capped the climax, when 16 were brought in. Fortunately 5 of these last were released on bond; but when the jail doors closed at 6 o'clock there were 228 on the inside, or 4 more than when the trip to Leavenworth was made.

How to account for the increase of crime is the point that is left to the reader to determine.

Now, I want to say to this House that with the conflict of jurisdiction in the courts there, with the thousands of white people in that Territory without law or government, we can not expect or hope anything else than for raid after raid to follow. Remember that the children of these 250,000 white people have not the benefit of public schools, or of any education except such as their parents may be able to give them, and yet they must furnish the blood for that country; and must it be the progressive, educated American citizen's blood, or must it be the poisoned blood of the criminal? In the face of the history of this country, I tell you we can not afford to stand still when we witness cases like that which I cited awhile ago—the Buck case—where both these inoffensive and virtuous women died from the outrages committed by these criminals and outlaws. Remember, too, that these outlaws are not confined to the Indians; many of them are white. They are made up of the lowest of all classes of people. Whenever a crime is committed anywhere throughout the United States the outlaw flies to that country, and as these Indian governments are not able to protect themselves or their people, I say it is our duty to see that that Territory is made, not a nesting place for criminals, but the home of a happy and progressive citizenship.

Now, I am asked what ought to be done, and I have no hesitancy in saying that this Congress ought to put a government over that Territory of sufficient strength to maintain property rights and protect human life. In the petition that I read a few moments ago, 40 citizens in one neighborhood say to you: "Give us martial law if you can not give us anything else." Men stickle over "treaty obligations." Sir, I ask you, is not the blood of the citizen, is not the protection of our women, of higher importance than treaty obligations, which have but the binding force of statutes? I am sick of this sentimentality. It would have done thirty or forty years ago.

I agree with you that a treaty, like a statute, must be maintained when rights of property have been vested under it. I do not want you to violate it. I do not want a cent's worth of the property of the Indians. I want it distributed according to the provisions of the treaties, but I do want a government there which will protect all the people in their property rights and in their lives. If you will examine these treaties you will find that in every one of them this Government reserves the right and power to protect life and property in the Territory. We have put courts out there with three Federal judges in their respective districts, yet the conditions have grown worse. The courts have been as efficient as they could be with their limited number of deputies; they have done all they could; but their dockets are overburdened. The dockets of the courts at Paris and Fort Smith are groaning under the burdens resting upon them. And, Mr. Chairman, you may put a Federal court in every township in that country, yet if you leave these conflicting interests standing you will not protect human life.

If you want a man to love a government he must have some interest in it. There you have 250,000 people without the right to vote, without a sense of allegiance to the government under which they live, and that government has no power over them. Those are the conditions existing there, and in the name of the blood of 300 men in that country, murdered in the past year, I appeal to you as the lawmaking power of this Government to extend its strong arm over that part of the country. I have lived upon that border all my life. I have gone to school with these Indian boys. I have courted, if you please, the Indian girls. [Laughter.] I know these people. Many of them I regard highly. They are a good people, as a rule, but, like average human nature, when they get the reins of government in their own hands they are grasping and disposed to use it for their own profit.

In addition to this I might say that I know many of the white people in that Territory, and out of the 250,000 a large majority are good, honest, law-abiding people, many of whom were unfortunate and whose homes were sold under mortgage in Kansas or Louisiana or Texas or other States, who were invited into the Indian Territory by these lease laws and have leased these farms and are living upon them. Those men are entitled to protection. The idea of the United States, broad and great, the proudest Government on earth—the idea of such a Government sitting here with a Territory within its borders as large as Indiana without the national flag! Five little, tottering, lean, crippled governments claiming to be sovereign, higher than our flag.

I beg you to take hold of this question with courage. Do justice to every Indian. I say this Congress ought to put its hands upon the throats of these men who have absorbed the lands of that Territory, and should distribute them justly among the Indians as the treaties provide. [Applause.] When men come to you arguing that existing conditions ought to be maintained, ask them, "How much land have you?" or "How much land have the men who sent you here?" That is what is the trouble—the unjust and unequal distribution of the land.

I am glad, sir, that on this question, nonpartisan as it is, we may look higher than partisanship. This is a question that appeals to us all, to our integrity, to our pride and self-respect as members of a great nation. We can not shut our eyes to the existing conditions. It is the cry of the Armenian at our own doors. Delegates from some of these Territories may deny those conditions; but every commission we have sent out to that country establishes the fact. I have read papers coming from the people there. Sir, I have a detailed list of eleven murders which occurred in the Cherokee Nation during last Christmas week; yet they were not enough to attract public attention. A little Territory, not much larger than an ordinary county, has eleven murders committed in one week, and it scarcely attracts the notice of the press.

My friends, I feel profoundly in earnest about this matter. I feel that upon the action of this Congress rest the lives of these people, the hopes of their children, the personal safety of their women. We can not shut our eyes to the facts as they present themselves. It is too late to discuss how they got there, whether they had a right to go there or not. Certainly their children are not responsible for being there. It is our duty to meet the existing conditions and to afford relief.

This Congress ought to establish an impartial tribunal to make a valid roll of those Indians. Those who are not entitled to be on that roll—who have absorbed the property of the Indians by bribery or fraud—ought to be stricken off the roll. Indians who claim that they have been denied their rights ought to be heard. They ought to be permitted to establish those rights if they can. When that is done the lands ought to be surveyed. They ought to be allotted in severalty among the Indians under such restrictions as Congress in its wisdom may deem proper. Sir, there are towns after towns, having not less than 5,000 inhabitants, that are now without government, without law. They are simple monuments of the progressive spirit of the average American. Yet they are without corporation laws, without health laws. There are no restraints except such as may be agreed to by common consent. Shall we act promptly, fearlessly, and give relief, or shall we stand still and let these appalling conditions continue? [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, for quite a time after the beginning of this session it was a mystery to me why I had been placed on the Committee on Indian Affairs. I had not requested the appointment. I knew very little about Indians, and I knew very little about the Representatives in Congress who are in the habit of speaking for the Indians. It only now begins to dawn upon me, as the weeks go by, that the Speaker of this House possibly did fairly well in putting on that committee some gentlemen who come from sections of country a little farther east than that of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE], who has just addressed the committee.

While I am not disposed to take issue with him in regard to the reforms which are necessary in the Indian Territory among the five tribes that inhabit it, I will say that the Indian has not been heard in this House and has no representative here. When the time comes to discuss the proposition to reform the government of the Indian Territory, then it is possible such a discussion may be had on that question as will not only fairly represent the white man's side of the controversy, but also that of the red man.

It is true there are many white men in the Indian Territory; but they are all volunteers in that country; they were not compelled to go there; they went there hoping that they might better themselves; and now being there, they want to reform that government so as to protect themselves possibly more than those who own the Territory, and are justly entitled to fair treatment on the part of this Government.

Mr. Chairman, I think this Indian appropriation bill is fair and just, and that it will meet very little opposition in this Committee of the Whole. I think the appropriations made in it are those which have generally been made by previous Congresses. The appropriations which have been made for the schools are not so large as they have been in former years.

APPROPRIATIONS TO SECTARIAN INSTITUTIONS.

Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in accord with those who are opposed to appropriations of public funds to be used in sectarian schools or other institutions of a denominational character. I am of the opinion that all public moneys should be expended under the direction of the Government through duly authorized officials. The argument against withholding appropriations to sectarian organizations is that the Government has not suitable schoolhouses and homes for the classes who are to be provided for out of public funds, and therefore we must either abandon the homeless and dependent children or turn them over to these sectarian organizations. That, Mr. Chairman, has been the argument for many years, and yet provision has not been made for them in Government institutions.

I am pleased to be able to say that this Indian appropriation bill carries only 60 per cent of the amount appropriated for contract schools in 1895, and provision is made for conducting Indian schools under Government supervision. If Congress shall steadily adhere to this policy the time will be short when the Government will be prepared to educate and provide for all who have just claims to share in the appropriations. If I could have my way I would dispense with appropriations for contract schools entirely. There is no necessity for continuing to make appropriations to denominational schools any longer than is required to provide schools and homes for these wards of the nation. There should be no delay in providing such institutions.

Only a few days ago this House struck from the bill making appropriations for the District of Columbia certain appropriations to quite a number of sectarian organizations. I voted to discontinue these appropriations, not because I wanted to discontinue such relief as is necessary and proper for the homeless and destitute children of this District, but because I think the time has come when we must take a decided stand against placing the public money in the hands of those who control its disbursement through sectarian schools and other denominational organizations. If it is necessary to have buildings for the use of these children they should be provided. But they will not be provided so long as Congress listens to the persuasive appeals of those who have heretofore had the use of the public funds in their denominational work.

Mr. Chairman, I am not to be deterred from my duty because of the charge made upon the floor of this House that this movement is the result of an agitation begun by the A. P. A. organization. I am not advised whether that organization has been instrumental in awakening public sentiment upon this question or not, but if it has I think it deserves credit for it rather than condemnation. It is also charged by the opposition to this policy that it is a crusade against the Catholic Church. Why that construction should be put upon it I can not understand, unless it is because that church has had a disproportionate amount of the public funds at its disposal.

It can not be denied that the Catholic Church has done much for the relief of the poor and suffering—and the same may be said of other churches—but it is equally true that as a church it does not have much regard for other denominations and other forms of worship. It will not intrust the early education of the children of its members to the public schools. And doubtless, as is most natural, from their standpoint of duty, their desire is to inculcate their religious doctrines into the minds of the children placed under their management. It may be urged that the same may be said of other churches as to those under their charge. If so, that does not constitute an argument in favor of confiding public money to sectarian organizations.

No, sir; it will not suffice to turn me against the principle which I am advocating, concerning the policy of the Government with reference to sectarian schools and organizations, to declaim against the American Protective Association because of its position concerning this question. On the contrary, I welcome the support of all men and all organizations in this effort to reform the administration of the public funds. I believe it will afford larger liberty of conscience and at the same time, under moral and religious supervision of Government officials, without reference to sect or denomination, accomplish more for the youthful inmates of our institutions, and the principles of our Government will find a deeper footing and a firmer lodgment in the hearts and minds of not only the beneficiaries of the Government's bounty but of the great body of the people of this free and independent Republic.

One of the cardinal principles of this Government is the separation of church and state, and I am unwilling to disregard that principle, although I may incur the displeasure of those who are interested in and seek to divert the public funds to the support of sectarian institutions. [Applause.] It has been said that the Government can not build the necessary schoolhouses now because there is no money which can be applied in that way.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that we should inaugurate a policy which will raise money to do that and many other things which would better the condition of the American people. If this House and the Senate and the President would give to the country a proper tariff law there would be enough money for all purposes, and there would be no deficiencies. I believe this House is to some extent responsible for the position we occupy before the country to-day. I voted for the very inadequate tariff bill which passed this body, but which is now tied up in the Senate. But it would not afford much protection to my constituents.

M'KINLEY AND PROTECTION.

Mr. Chairman, I read in a newspaper recently that the great champion of the protective-tariff idea in the United States had recently taken backward steps on the tariff question. I deny that, Mr. Chairman, and in refutation of the false assertion I will send to the Clerk's desk and have read some remarks made by Mr. McKinley in his recent speech in the city of Chicago before the Marquette Club.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I wish to ask a question.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I object to being interrupted. I do not want my time to be exhausted. I ask the Clerk to read the article I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk proceeded to read.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman objects to what?

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I have a right to have the article read.

Mr. BENNETT. I make the point of order against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman can have the extract read as part of his remarks.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I think the Chair has made a mistake; the caucus does not begin until 8 o'clock to-night. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I ask the Clerk to read what I send to the desk.

The Clerk proceeded to read.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order against bringing politics into this Chamber. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. What point of order does the gentleman make?

Mr. BREWSTER. That this article that the Clerk is reading is not germane to the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order, and the Clerk will proceed with the reading.

The Clerk then resumed and concluded the reading of the extract, as follows:

PROTECTIVE SYSTEM.

The question of the continuance or abandonment of our protective system has been the one great, overshadowing, and vital question in American politics ever since Mr. Cleveland opened the contest in December, 1887, to which the lamented James G. Blaine made swift reply from across the sea—and it will continue the issue until a truly American policy, for the good of America, is firmly established and perpetuated. The fight will go on and must go on until the American system is everywhere recognized, until all nations come to understand and respect it as distinctly and all Americans come to honor and love it as dearly as they do the American flag.

[Applause.]

God grant the day may soon come when all partisan contention over it is forever at an end!

[Renewed applause.]

It may be asked what the next Republican tariff law will provide. I can not tell you. I can not tell you what the schedules and rates will be, but they will measure the difference between American and European conditions, and will, moreover, be fully adequate to protect ourselves from the invasion of our markets by Oriental products to the injury of American labor, and will in no case be too low to protect and exalt American labor and promote and increase American production.

[Great applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DINSMORE. Will the gentleman yield to me for an inquiry?

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I have no time; I must be excused.

Mr. DINSMORE. It is a mere inquiry.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I hope the Chairman will get order. I wish to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Now, Mr. Chairman, I simply had that slip read for the purpose of showing to this Congress, and to the country, that this great representative of American protection has taken no back ground. [Applause.] Furthermore, gentlemen, whatever may be said by politicians on that great question, here or elsewhere, whether it comes from Eastern States where we have some free-trade Republicans, or whether it comes from the North, South, or West, one thing is sure, the people of this country want genuine, old-fashioned, Republican, protective-tariff legislation, and I think this House should pass such a bill. [Applause.] Away down in the hearts of the Republicans of the United States protection is deeply rooted and firmly established as the great and overshadowing economic question of vital importance to the languishing industries of the American people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have a good many points to discuss that are pertinent to this Indian question. [Laughter.] But in the brief time allotted to me I shall have to pass them. I wanted to talk on the Monroe doctrine. I wanted to show how this country, under the leadership of one of the great Presidents, had taken a position which established, at least so far as this country is concerned, a policy which is necessary for the aggrandizement of American institutions and for the growth of this great Republic.

First, we had the trouble with Great Britain and Russia in the extreme north. They wanted to enlarge their possessions in North America. In 1823 a similar question arose between the Allied Powers of Europe and the United States concerning the revolutionary subjects of Spain in South America. These aggressions of European powers led to the declaration of the Monroe doctrine. This doctrine, briefly stated, was that the United States would not interfere with European provinces in this hemisphere, but would interpose to prevent the overthrow of governments which had been recognized by this Government, and also declared that European nations would not be permitted to establish new governments or acquire new possessions upon American soil.

Now the matter is before us again, arising out of this Venezuela question; and I am thoroughly convinced that the Monroe doctrine applies to the controversy between Great Britain relative to the true line between British Guiana and Venezuela. How does the Monroe doctrine apply to this controversy? Because England claims territory which is disputed. If she may, by reason of her superior power, take forcible possession of that disputed territory, which may not belong to British Guiana, she may thereby enlarge her possessions on American soil. That is directly in violation of the Monroe doctrine. It is true that Great Britain claims the disputed territory, but shall the matter be decided by Great Britain as the sole arbiter of a dispute in which she is interested? I think not, and while, as General Sherman once said in my presence, "War is hell," I say, notwithstanding all that, if it becomes necessary for this country to uphold the Monroe doctrine and maintain her credit here and throughout the world we had better have war, with all its cruelties, than to suffer humiliation and dishonor or lower the American standard upon land and sea. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wanted to discuss the pension question briefly in connection with this bill. [Laughter.] I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that during the past year there were 39,185 new pensions granted and 103,355 rejected. I should think the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] would be satisfied with that kind of an administration of the Pension Office; about three times as many pension claims rejected as were allowed. I have not time to discuss the policy of the Pension Office, but I here and now desire to say that I think the office is illiberal and unjust in its treatment of the valiant and patriotic men who carried the flag of the Union triumphantly through four years of cruel and bloody war. [Applause.]

Mr. BURRELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I have no time for questions.

THE MONEY QUESTION.

Mr. Chairman, if we are to pay these great appropriations, and place this country on an easy footing, we must have some money, and I should like to discuss the currency question in connection with the free coinage of silver.

Mr. BURRELL. Take up the service-pension bill and speak about that.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I can not take more time at present.

Now, Mr. Chairman, my colleague [Mr. DE WITT] offered a very considerate proposition with regard to the coinage of silver. I submit that it would be well for every free-coinage man, and every man in this country who favors bimetallism, to consider that proposition and see whether it is a good one. But I have a proposition which I am going to submit. It is the act of July 14, 1890, except no coin is to be issued, but notes are to be issued and redeemed in bullion.

I send the proposed measure to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SILVER BULLION REDEMPTION FUND.

A bill providing for the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of United States Treasury notes redeemable in bullion.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to purchase, from time to time, silver bullion to the aggregate amount of 4,500,000 ounces, or so much thereof as may be offered in each month, at the market price thereof, not exceeding $1 for 371.25 grains of pure silver, and to issue in payment of such purchases of silver bullion Treasury notes of the United States to be prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury in such form and of such denominations, not less than $1 nor more than $1,000, as he may prescribe, and a sum sufficient to carry into effect the provisions of this act is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 2. That the silver bullion which shall be purchased under the provisions of this act shall be kept in the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of redeeming the Treasury notes issued in accordance with the provisions of this act; and said Treasury notes shall be redeemable on demand in silver bullion, purchased under the provisions of this act, at the Treasury of the United States, or at the office of any assistant treasurer of the United States where there is silver bullion kept for that purpose; and the holder of any Treasury note issued pursuant to the provisions of this act, upon surrender thereof to the Secretary of the Treasury, in sums of $50, or any multiples thereof, shall receive in exchange or payment therefor silver bullion equal in market value, on the day of surrender, to the amount expressed on the face of the note or notes surrendered; and when surrendered such notes may be reissued. But no greater or less amount of such notes shall be outstanding at any time than the cost of the silver bullion purchased under this act and then held in the Treasury purchased by such notes; and such Treasury notes shall be a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract, and shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues; and when so received may be reissued.

SEC. 3. That the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of this act shall be subject to the requirements of existing law and the regulations of the mint service governing the methods of determining the amount of pure silver contained, and the amount of charges or deductions, if any, to be made.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury, or some competent person to be appointed by him, shall daily ascertain and fix the market price of silver bullion which shall be purchased under the provisions of this act, and the price so fixed on each day shall be the maximum price at which bullion may be purchased or paid in redemption of notes, but if during the day the market price declines from or is less than the price fixed for such day, then purchases and redemptions may be made at the market price without reference to the price fixed for that day.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I do not claim originality for the thought expressed in this proposition, for it has been discussed before.

If such a bill as the one which I have submitted should be enacted, I believe it would create a currency which would be safe, and, instead of depending upon gold for its parity, would always be worth in gold the face value of the notes issued in pursuance of its provisions. Every dollar represented in a note would be worth a gold dollar's worth of silver bullion, and upon demand therefor the Secretary would exchange a dollar's worth of bullion for each dollar so represented. This would make the redemption of these notes rest upon a silver redemption fund, consisting of the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of the act. The form of the statute is like the act of July 14, 1890, and differs from that act principally in providing for the redemption of the notes in silver bullion instead of coin, which, under that act, was construed to mean redemption in gold.

I do not know that the proposed measure will meet the approval of ultra free-coinage advocates, but it ought to be acceptable to the real friends of bimetallism. It would doubtless help to sustain the price of silver by making a greater demand for its use, and in a way that would not give it a fictitious value. The limit of the amount which might be purchased is not very material, and perhaps might as well be left out, because the plan would be entirely safe to any extent of operation without possible loss to the Government unless its operation should tend to depreciate silver. Such a result is improbable, and if it ever should transpire that the price of bullion should decline a little I think the necessity for some additional redemption fund would warrant Congress in taking a little risk of possible loss from a decline in the value of bullion.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Are not the silver certificates as good as gold?

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. The gentleman asks me if silver certificates are not as good as gold. They are, because when the United States declared that gold and silver metals should be maintained on a parity these certificates became as good as gold, because they are based on gold. All of our paper currency, including $333,456,236 silver certificates, $141,092,280 Treasury notes under the act of July 14, 1890, and $346,681,016 greenbacks now in circulation, is based upon gold. And it may be said the national-bank notes, amounting to $207,368,028 on November 1, 1895, are included. I think to a great extent they are included, because they are redeemable in lawful money, and lawful money is payable in gold. Of course they have the additional security which the bonds deposited for their redemption gives them. But, nevertheless, whoever has national-bank notes may, by demanding their payment in greenbacks and Treasury notes, procure such paper as will be redeemed in gold.

This is too great a draft upon the gold in this country. Our supply of coin is as follows: Gold coin, $564,132,920, and gold bullion, $53,945,262; silver coin, $500,548,489, and silver bullion, $125,078,608. But of these metals $646,179,727 are held in the Treasury, and held there as basic money, and upon which the credit of our paper currency depends. And therefore indirectly every national-bank note may be used to get gold.

Mr. HYDE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I do not think I can yield, as I have very little time. If it is a short one I will yield; but when we strike a Western man we do not know where he will end. He often injects a silver speech into his question.

Mr. HYDE. Is a silver certificate now, or has it ever been, redeemed in gold or anything but silver?

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. There is nothing redeemed in silver in the United States. No paper currency is redeemed in silver. I admit that the Secretary of the Treasury has discretion to pay in either coin. But by the act of July 14, 1890, and again by the law of 1893, repealing in part the act of 1890, it is declared to be the policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity, and the only way to accomplish that is by paying our paper currency in the most valuable coin. If that policy had not been followed, silver coin would have depreciated, as would any currency redeemable in silver.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does not the law say the two metals?

Mr. HYDE. Is it not a fact that they are redeemed in gold, and the law says they shall be redeemed by the silver in the Treasury?

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. The law does not so require; of course they would redeem them in silver if the holders wanted silver. If the holder of paper currency will take silver the Secretary of the Treasury will give it to him if there is any silver coin which can be used. But, of course, nobody is going to take silver in preference to gold, when gold is of more value; he will take gold every time, if he has use for coin, except in small amounts.

Mr. HYDE. Can he get gold for silver certificates to-day?

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I can not discuss the matter fully with the gentleman. I think I have answered correctly. If they are redeemed at all they are redeemed in gold.

I furthermore say the silver of this country is also dependent, to a large extent, upon gold, and how is it so? Silver is a legal tender except where it is otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract, and in all business transactions it may be exchanged for lawful money, and with the lawful money the former silver holder may go to the Treasury of the United States and get gold. There is not a dollar of currency, other than gold, which does not derive more or less standing because it may be used, directly or indirectly, to procure gold. I have no doubt the credit of our silver coin is greatly sustained because there is substantially a limited coinage of that metal. I do not like this condition of finances, for I think it unduly enhances the value of gold.

We need the use of more silver currency, not only for circulation, but for redemption purposes, and if you free coinage gentlemen will get rid of your delusion—one that you will never be able to impose upon Congress—and accept a dollar for a dollar's worth of silver, instead of asking the Government to stamp and declare legal tender a piece of silver worth much less than a dollar, you will find much support from the older States. This country wants gold and silver, but it wants both on a parity.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I will.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Are you expressing the views of your candidate for the Presidency on the financial question of this country? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I simply say this: That the candidate to whom the gentleman refers stands upon the national platform—for bimetallism; and the way to accomplish it is to make both metals of equal value, so that neither will depend upon the other for its value. In this way we may have bimetallism. Under free coinage at 16 to 1 the coins would not circulate side by side owing to the great disparity in their values. Bimetallism requires both to circulate. [Applause.]

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman state whether any silver certificate has ever been redeemed in gold?

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Well, I simply use the reports coming from the Department. I say that the $333,000,000 silver certificates now outstanding are classed along with the paper currency, which is redeemable in gold. You will find that statement in the report of the Director of the Mint.

Now, gentlemen, I have discussed this Indian appropriation bill in all fairness [laughter] and without consuming any more of your time——

Mr. HARDY. I move that the gentleman may be granted ten minutes longer.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I am obliged to the gentleman from Indiana, but do not ask any further time. All I ask of gentlemen is that they will seriously consider the arguments I have made in favor of this appropriation and allow me to print so much of my speech as I have not had time to deliver.

Mr. HARTMAN. Are there any more barrels to your shotgun—anything about the Cuban question?

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I will say to the gentleman that if there are any they would not do as some other gentlemen's do—fire nothing but wind. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. General debate, by order of the committee, is closed, and the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of paying the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department for the year ending June 30, 1897, and fulfilling treaty stipulations for the various Indian tribes, namely——

Mr. DOCKERY. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I ask permission of the gentleman in charge of the bill to submit an amendment, to come in after the word "Department," in line 6, "in full compensation for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, line 6, after the word "Department," add the words "in full compensation for the service."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the Yankton Agency, S. Dak., $1,600; in all, $85,000: Provided, That the foregoing appropriations shall not take effect nor become available in any case for or during the time in which any officer of the Army of the United States shall be engaged in the performance of the duties of Indian agent at any of the agencies above named: Provided further, That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, may devolve the duties of any Indian agency upon the superintendent of the Indian training school located at such agency, whenever in his judgment such superintendent can properly perform the duties of such agency. And the superintendent upon whom such duties devolve shall give bond as other Indian agents.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 6, strike out lines 19, 20, and the words "in which," in line 21, and insert "no" before "officer," in line 21.

Mr. SHERMAN. I reserve the point of order against that amendment.

Mr. PICKLER. Make your point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. The point is that the amendment changes existing law.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to provide that no army officer shall be detailed as an Indian agent.

The CHAIRMAN. Does not the existing law provide that officers may be detailed to that duty?

Mr. PICKLER. The appropriation bills passed from year to year have generally contained that provision.

Mr. SHERMAN. All the appropriation bills that I have seen have included that provision, so that the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota would change the law as it exists.

Mr. PICKLER. I think it is a question, Mr. Chairman, whether when you simply make a law from year to year in an appropriation bill it can be regarded as the "existing law."

Mr. BOWERS. There is no question about it. The gentleman knows that the provision in the appropriation bill says that "hereafter" it shall be lawful to make these details.

Mr. PICKLER. Who has the floor, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. BOWERS. I have it; at least it looks as if I had. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PICKLER. If the gentleman in charge of the bill makes the point of order, I will not press the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have to decide the point by his recollection of the existing law. The recollection of the Chair is that the appropriation bills have provided by positive enactment that army officers may be detailed for this purpose, and, with that recollection, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the Chair will pardon a suggestion, suppose there was no appropriation bill passed this year, would there still be in existence, as a result of last year's appropriation bill, a law authorizing the detail of these officers; or did the operation of that appropriation bill end absolutely with the fiscal year to which it applied? That is the real question here, and while I take no sides on the particular point at issue, the question I have presented strikes me as an important one. To illustrate, there is a limitation put upon the expenditure of a given appropriation in last year's bill, that it shall not be used for this purpose or that it may be used for that purpose; now, is that the "existing law," so that the appropriation bill passed this year can not make a different limitation? That, it seems to me, is the real question, and the only important one here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated that the appropriation bill of last year, according to his recollection (which seems to be confirmed by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs), contained a positive enactment that army officers might be detailed for this duty. Now, if that be so any provision which repeals or modifies that statute is a change of existing law.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The Chair is undoubtedly right if there is a statute in existence.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated that he was deciding the question upon his recollection, and it seems to be conceded that that recollection is correct.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But gentlemen here are now contending that there is no existing law on the subject except what appears in the annual appropriation bill.

Mr. PICKLER. I am quite certain of that.

The CHAIRMAN. The recollection of the Chair is that the provision was made in the appropriation bill, but made as a positive enactment. The Chair may be wrong in his recollection, and if he is he trusts that some gentleman will correct him.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw that amendment, and move to strike out lines 19, 20, 21, 22, and 23, down to the word "Provided" and to insert this language: "No officer of the Army of the United States shall be engaged in the performance of the duties of Indian agent at any of the agencies above named." That is merely stating the same proposition in a different form.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the same point of order on that.

Mr. PICKLER. I should like to have a vote of the House on this proposition. I believe it is a good proposition. The question has been discussed a good deal from time to time, and I think that during all the time I have been in Congress the provision for the detail of army officers has been made only in the appropriation bills. The gentleman from California [Mr. BOWERS] suggests that the provisions in appropriation bills have provided that this authority to detail officers to act as Indian agents should continue "hereafter." From year to year that provision has been repeated in the appropriation bills; but I do not think that it operates beyond the end of the year, because, as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], it is clear that if no appropriation bill were passed this year there would no longer be an "existing law" on this subject.

I believe that this amendment is in order. I believe that the provision which has been referred to is merely one which appears from year to year in the appropriation bill. If it is the existing law, why does the committee insert it in this bill? Why is it continually repeated from year to year?

This case is not like other cases—for instance, one which we had the other day—where there is a conflicting provision in the Revised Statutes. At least, according to my memory, this provision is not in the Revised Statutes, but is simply carried in the appropriation bills from year to year.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman noticed the language of the proviso? It is that this appropriation shall not be available where an officer of the Army performs the duties of Indian agent. It is in that way a limitation upon the appropriation.

Mr. PICKLER. In that case is not the argument so much stronger to show that it is not a provision of existing or continuing law? It is merely a limitation upon an annual appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that the proviso interferes at all with the existing law. If the Chair is right in his recollection of the facts, the amendment proposed is a change of existing law the same as the other proposition. The recollection of the Chair is quite clear that there was quite a struggle in the House over changing the law in this respect, so as to allow army officers to act as Indian agents; that the provision was enacted after a long debate.

Mr. BOWERS. If I may be allowed a minute, I think I can state the facts in regard to this matter very briefly.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Dakota yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. PICKLER. I presume I must do so, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BOWERS. This provision, which was inserted in an appropriation bill in the Fifty-second Congress, was written by myself. It was offered by me as an amendment; and I think it was included in a single line, something like this: "Provided, That hereafter the President of the United States shall detail army officers to perform the duties of Indian agents so fast as vacancies occur."

Mr. PICKLER. That is permanent law.

Mr. BOWERS. That is the whole provision. As has been stated, the proposition was debated for some time; but it was debated longer after it passed than before—some men in Congress were so much surprised about it. The discussion of the matter occupied the Senate about two weeks.

The provision has not been in any appropriation bill since that time, nor was it in any previous bill. It has never been repeated in any appropriation bill; but, as I have said, it is as much the statute law to-day as any law on the books. The gentleman from South Dakota knows it. He makes this fight—I am perfectly willing he should make it—"for the benefit of whom it may concern," every time this bill comes before the House. But we all understand the question. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman should make as good a fight as he can.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I am for this proposition every time it comes before the House, because I believe in it. We have 25,000 Indians in my State—more than in any other State, I believe. We have seven of these agencies, and we know something of this Indian business. As I said yesterday, we know that as a rule civilians are the proper persons for administering the affairs of the Indian agencies. The political party appointing an Indian agent is responsible for that officer, the officer is responsible to his party, and thus we have better service. An army officer (while I have no objection to him in his own line) is out of his line of business when acting as an Indian agent. He does not take the same interest in such matters that a civilian does. He has not so much at heart the interests of the Indians, their education and civilization. It is the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and of everyone that has had anything to do with the investigation of this question that civilians are the proper persons to act as Indian agents. I am opposed to army officers being detailed for this purpose, because such a practice is against the best interests of the Indian service.

I do not undertake to say what was the language of the provision which was inserted in the Indian appropriation bill. It may have been what the gentleman from California has stated; I do not remember the language. But my proposition was that it was simply a provision in an appropriation bill.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this paragraph be passed over until a later stage in the consideration of the bill, so that we may find out what the law is on this subject. Has the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] in charge of this bill any objection to that?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not. If there is any question about the facts on which this point of order rests, I do not care to have the Chair run the risk of passing upon the question on an erroneous statement of fact. I do not think, however, there is really any question about the fact——

Mr. BOWERS. There is not. In a moment I will get the record.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to passing over this paragraph informally and going on with the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the pending paragraph be passed over informally with the point of order pending. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of five Indian inspectors, at $3,000 per annum each, $15,000.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the clause just read providing for the payment of five Indian inspectors. I do not know whether the House is aware of the fact, but my experience is that these five Indian inspectors, attached to the Secretary's office, are used solely by him, or very largely at least, as his political body guards.

They have been sent into Oklahoma Territory during the past three years to work up a sentiment, if such a thing were possible to be done, in favor of the present Secretary of the Interior. At the present time there are two of these inspectors in Pottawatomie County, Okla., and they have caused more trouble with the settlers there than Hoke Smith ever did during his entire administration. It is true that we have been plundered through the course of the Secretary of the Interior, but we overlook all that sort of thing out there.

Now, there are men out there threatening to eject men from farms on which they have built houses, on which they have lived for years, and on which they have planted orchards. Under the system now in operation these men are to be ejected from their homes, and this is done under the statement that they were not paying rent enough to the Indians.

It is well known, Mr. Chairman, to everybody who lives in the West that cash rents in the semiarid regions are almost unknown. The only form of rent, where a man rents the farm at all, is that form in which he pays a percentage of the crops. These inspectors are demanding more rent now per acre in that region of country in some cases than the lands could be sold for. I have appealed to the Indian Office and insisted that a change in this respect was necessary; that something should be done toward righting these people; but, as usual in this Administration, a deaf ear is always turned to the appeal of the poor settler.

I would offer an amendment for the appointment of competent inspectors, if any are to be appointed, were I not well aware of the fact that the standard of efficiency under the present Secretary of the Interior is so low that a man who never saw a farm in his life would be as capable, and more so, than some of the men who are sent out among us to transact farm business for the Indians. For that reason I know it would be absolutely useless to offer such an amendment. And therefore I think the House is justified in refusing to continue the five Indian inspectors, who are, as I have said already, mere personal guards of the Secretary, traveling through the country for no other purpose, but causing ruin wherever they go.

I trust that the House will refuse to indorse the action of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and refuse to permit the present Administration to continue this force in existence, and thus demonstrate that Congress at least has some interest in the welfare of the white men who have been placed at the political mercy of Hoke Smith, and that these men shall not be turned loose to defraud them as they have been defrauded in the past.

I move to strike out that provision of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I think my friend from Oklahoma is rather more enthusiastic than earnest in his declarations.

Mr. FLYNN. Give us a vote upon it and you will see.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hardly think the Secretary of the Interior needs or desires any defense from me in reference to his Indian policy at least. But I disagree with the gentleman from Oklahoma entirely when he says that the only use of these inspectors under this or any other Administration is to act as political emissaries of the Secretary of the Interior. I think that they are a valuable part of the Indian service, and I am surprised that the gentleman makes the amendment here. He did not give us any notice in the committee of his desire to do so, and I hope that it will be voted down.

Mr. FLYNN. The reason I did not do so in committee was because I did not have the petition of 500 of the taxpayers of Pottawatomie County, Okla., asking the removal of these men from the Territory.

Mr. DOCKERY. This, I believe, Mr. Chairman, is a motion to strike out the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to strike out the lines which have just been read.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to perfect the paragraph before the motion to strike out is submitted to the committee, and in order to do so I move to amend by striking out the words "three thousand," in line 11, and inserting "two thousand five hundred." I also move to amend by striking out the words "fifteen thousand," in line 12, and inserting "twelve thousand five hundred" instead, so as to make the total correspond with the change suggested in the preceding line.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri.

The amendment was read.

Mr. DOCKERY. I only desire to say this to the committee—to both sides of this Chamber—that these inspectors have heretofore received $2,500 per annum.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is this a proposition to increase the salary?

Mr. DOCKERY. It is a proposition to increase each salary $500.

Mr. CRISP. I will ask the gentleman if the law does not fix the salary?

Mr. DOCKERY. It is fixed by statute.

Mr. CRISP. Then, how does this change the law? The salaries were cut before to the present figure, but contrary to law.

Mr. DOCKERY. I wish to say in answer to the gentleman from Georgia that this does increase the salaries, because the current law, which is the law for this year, fixes the amount at $2,500 for each of these inspectors.

Mr. CRISP. But the statute creating the office fixes the salary at $3,000.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is true. And I want to say further, Mr. Chairman, that since the Forty-fourth Congress, a Congress memorable in the history of the party to which I belong, more than one hundred salaries carried in this and other bills have been fixed below the statutory limit.

Now, I do not know any gentleman connected with this service. I have no interest whatever in this paragraph, but it did occur to me that these gentlemen, having accepted these positions at $2,500, ought to continue to discharge the duties of their positions, and their successors could very well afford to accept the offices at the same compensation.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, just a word. Of course I appreciate the efforts of my friend to protect the Treasury, but still, in his zeal, I think he has been a little misled about what has taken place as to these officers. The statute provides that the salaries shall be $3,000, and that is the statute under which they accepted the office, and there has always been $3,000 appropriated for them except in the last two bills.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is right.

Mr. CRISP. The last two bills reduced the amount to $2,500; so that so far from accepting the office at $2,500, they accepted it at $3,000.

Mr. DINGLEY. But was not the salary $2,500 when these present officials were appointed?

Mr. CRISP. Three thousand dollars.

Mr. DINGLEY. But had it not been fixed at $2,500 in the appropriation bill?

Mr. CRISP. No; it has only been $2,500 in the last two bills. These gentlemen came in three years ago. When they were appointed the salary was $3,000. It seems to me, so long as that is the salary, we ought to appropriate for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] has correctly stated the facts. The present inspectors, with possibly one exception, were appointed when the salary of the office was $3,000. It has been that all the time until the last Congress—the last two bills—and then it was cut down to $2,500. Now, the mere fact that my friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] suggests that somebody else may fill these positions for $2,500 is, I think, no argument. I have no doubt that scores of men can be found in the district of the gentleman from Missouri—I know it is so in mine—who would gladly come here to accept and fill our places for much less salary than we are receiving. I think somebody struggled pretty hard to do it for the present salary in the gentleman's district at the last election, and I have no doubt somebody will do it this fall in his district and in mine. I think that is no argument whatever; but when the law fixes a salary I do not believe—and this House declares in its rules that it does not believe—in the policy of changing existing law in an appropriation bill. I do not believe it is proper, when the statute of the country for fifteen years has fixed a salary, that we should arbitrarily cut it down in an appropriation bill.

Mr. LACEY. I will ask the gentleman if these inspectors are not allowed $4 per day for subsistence and mileage in addition to this?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is an allowance for actual expenses while traveling.

Mr. BARRETT. It is fixed at $4 a day, is it not?

Mr. LACEY. They may commute it.

Mr. HOPKINS. They have to pay that out.

Mr. LACEY. They get the $2,500 net. They have their living and traveling expenses paid at the rate of $4 per day, besides the salary.

Mr. PEARSON. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee which is existing law, this salary of $2,500 a year as it is now or the original law of $3,000 a year? Which is existing law, the law as it stands to-day or the law before it was changed?

Mr. SHERMAN. The law has not been changed, I will say, if the gentleman is addressing his question to me. The law still says that the salary shall be $3,000 a year, but the last Congress, led by our—I was about to say parsimonious—economical friend from Indiana, Mr. Holman, appropriated only $2,500 for the salary.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman should say "economical Congress," not "economical friend from Indiana." The gentleman from Indiana is not present to defend himself.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think the gentleman from Indiana would attempt to defend himself against that charge if he were here. I think he would rather applaud me for saying that. In the last Congress the amount appropriated was $2,500, and unless this provision which the gentleman from Missouri now incorporates into the bill was in the last bill—and I do not remember whether it was or not—they would still have the right to recover their $500 in the Court of Claims.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] will prevail. I understand it is to decrease the salary as proposed in the bill from $3,000 to $2,500 of five inspectors.

First, upon the merits. Twenty-five hundred dollars salary for an Indian inspector is, in my judgment, sufficient, when it is recollected that transportation and subsistence are paid outside of the $2,500. That is a much better salary than most Government officials receive, including Representatives and Senators.

Now, so much for the merits of the proposition. For two years past the appropriation has been $2,500 a year for these inspectors. They have not suffered. I know of no reason why in the present condition of the Treasury this side of the House should fall over itself to increase this amount to these employees, especially against the protest of most of the other side. It is true the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] favors the increase; but when he had the honor to preside in the last Congress, with the great power of the Speaker, I take notice that the salary of these inspectors was fixed at $2,500 a year by his own political friends.

Now, one word further, because we ought to be consistent. In 1875, under the lead of Mr. Randall, in a Democratic House, in the legislative bill, a substantial copy of which I hold in my hand, after a contest of three months, salaries were reduced all along the line below the amount fixed by the Revised Statutes; and every item of these——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I suggest to my colleague——

Mr. CANNON. In a minute.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I suggest to my colleague that that was done long before the last Congress; all the way up since the Forty-fourth Congress?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; and from that time to this the salaries as they were fixed below the salaries fixed in the Revised Statutes have continued; and there are between 100 and 200 salaries in the legislative bill, now on the Calendar, below the compensation fixed by the Revised Statutes, and have been for twenty years. Now, then, if we are to follow the example and recommendation of the committee upon these inspectors, later on, when we call up the legislative bill, the next one to follow this bill, to be consistent, we should force upon our Democratic friends in office between one and two hundred increases upon this legislative bill.

For one, in the present condition of the Treasury, I will not vote for it. I believe that I have as much disposition to compensate a public servant up to the full value of his service as anybody; and without any desire to follow in the footsteps of anybody claiming to be in favor of cheeseparing, upon the very merits, I will not vote for this increase, but will vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, to keep the salaries at what they now are. I hope this side will follow along that line. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word or two. I am very sorry that I can not agree with everything that has been said by my honored colleague from Illinois. I have no personal acquaintance with any person whose salary is affected by the motion made by the gentleman from Missouri, so that I can not be charged with any personal or selfish motive. I do know that when this matter was investigated and this office of Indian inspector was created the parties having this matter in charge, knowing the amount of responsibility that would be thrown upon these men, fixed the salary at $3,000, and that that salary has been maintained from that time to the present. Now, since these men who are to be affected by the motion of the gentleman from Missouri were appointed, under the leadership of Mr. Holman of Indiana, their salary was cut down in the last appropriation bill to $2,500, being $500 less than allowed by law, $500 less than they had a right to expect when they received their appointment from the present Administration.

I do not sympathize with those gentlemen who say that this is a matter among Democrats and that if a Democrat sees fit to make a motion to cut the salaries down we as Republicans will follow such leadership. These men are officers of the Government of the United States, in the discharge of their duties. They are discharging them as American citizens and as officers of the Government of the United States, not as Democrats nor as Republicans. The question for us to determine here to-day is not the personnel of these men, but whether or not a mistake was made by our predecessors in office when they created that office and fixed the salary at $3,000. We follow the leadership of the men who have charge of this in committee, the gentlemen representing the Committee on Indian Affairs, who have made the statement——

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Do you think it is the duty of this side of the House to increase something over a hundred salaries that have been reduced for nearly twenty years below the amount allowed by statute and increase the salary of those officers something like $100,000?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do think it would be the duty of this House to pass upon that question, if that were before us; but it is not.

Mr. SAYERS. But it will be before the committee.

Mr. HOPKINS. One gentleman at a time. I can be happy with either if the other will keep quiet. That question is not before the House. Now as to the point made by my colleague, that the salaries fixed by the Forty-fourth Congress have been followed since by the House. Every officer represented in that bill when he received his appointment did so with the full knowledge that the salary had been reduced to the amount that is now represented in the bill. But the case is different here. So far as these inspectors are concerned, when they received their appointments from the President of the United States their salary was $3,000; and there would be just as much justice in the Congress fixing the amount of your salary at $4,000 instead of $5,000 as it is for you, by your vote, to say that these inspectors shall get $2,500 instead of $3,000 each.

Mr. HEMENWAY. You are fixing——

Mr. HOPKINS. You have the brute force to do it, as this House has the brute force to reduce your salary to $4,000; nevertheless you accepted your present position under conditions where the law said you were entitled to receive $5,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask for five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. HEMENWAY. You are trying to fix a precedent here to base other cases upon, but we do not propose to fix that precedent.

Mr. HOPKINS. What I was about to remark, Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted by my friend on the other side of the aisle, was that the Committee on Indian Affairs when they had the subject under consideration had the Commissioner and other experts before them, and I understand from the chairman of the committee that the opinion of the Department is that these salaries ought to be restored to the amount fixed by law.

Mr. NORTHWAY. They wanted the restoration last year, but they did not get it.

Mr. HOPKINS. Well, do two wrongs make a right?

Mr. NORTHWAY. No.

Mr. HOPKINS. If an injustice was done last year I see no reason why it should be continued this year. We all know, from the trend of public sentiment, that the personnel of these offices will be changed, and that men of a different political faith will be put in these places, and I do want to set a precedent, so as to make these men understand that, regardless of political affiliations, this House will do justice by them. If these salaries are too high as fixed by law, let us pass a bill to reduce them; but let us not attempt to do it in this manner, after men have accepted the offices with the understanding that the law of the country will be observed by the Congress of the United States and that appropriations commensurate with the salaries fixed by law will be made.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Chairman, I merely want to say to my friend from Illinois that it is suggested on this side of the House that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] had these salaries reduced in order to meet the increase in the purchasing power of money, estimating that $2,500 now would be more than equal in purchasing power to $3,000 at the time the salary was fixed by law. [Laughter.] But, seriously speaking, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the position taken by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], who last addressed the House, is a perfectly sound one. If a statute of the United States fixes a salary, Congress may appropriate less than the salary as compensation for the services, but it can not do so without violating the law or without taking advantage of the fact that an appropriation bill, affecting, as it does, so many interests, may be approved, when, if a special statute reducing the salary had to be considered on its own merits, it would not receive favorable consideration; and the fact that these officials have received less than their proper salaries for two years is no argument, to my mind, why they should not receive their entire salary for the next fiscal year, especially as in this case the salaries were fixed, not only by statute, but also by the appropriation bill at the time these men were appointed to office.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LACEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 4153) to grant the Fort Smith and Western Coal Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 1100) granting a pension to Russel N. Reynolds;
A bill (S. 1017) granting a pension to Robert Kiracofe;
A bill (S. 997) granting a pension to Ella D. Cross;
A bill (S. 1505) granting an increase of pension to Rufus H. Paine;
A bill (S. 146) granting an increase of pension to Samuel C. Towne;
A bill (S. 878) granting a pension to Jared S. Chamberlain;
A bill (S. 625) granting a pension to Nellie L. Groshon;
A bill (S. 757) granting an increase of pension to Adelaide Morris;

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee again resumed its session.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to take issue with the gentleman from Illinois in his contention that there is an obligation on the part of Congress to continue unchanged the salary of any officer of this Government except in such instances as are prescribed by the Constitution. I understand the gentleman to insist that because three or four years ago these inspectors were each paid $3,000 per annum, that therefore it would be a violation of the law and of sound morals and good conscience to decrease their salaries during their term of office. Mr. Chairman, I deny that there was any such contract entered into, either expressed or implied, between the Government and these gentlemen when they were appointed inspectors. The trouble in the way of the House about decreasing or increasing the salaries of these and similarly situated officials is that the rules of the House, if invoked, prevent such action. Where an appropriation fixing the salary of any officer for a particular year is made by Congress, such an appropriation is as much law to that extent as the original statute.

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment at that point?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. BOATNER. Have not the courts held that where the appropriation is less than the amount of the salary fixed by law the officer may sue and recover?

Mr. SAYERS. The courts have held that where a provision is found in an appropriation bill that the appropriation made to cover a salary in such bill shall be accepted in full payment of all services, such an appropriation is valid and binding, and the official can not go into court and obtain a judgment against the Government for a larger amount than was appropriated in the bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. But suppose the party declines to accept that appropriation and sues for his salary?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I will say to my colleague [Mr. SAYERS] that the court only decided that that was true where the appropriation bill itself provided that the acceptance of the sum appropriated should operate as an acquittance of the Government.

Mr. SAYERS. That results not only from the acceptance of the sum specified in the bill, but also from the provision in the bill that the amount appropriated shall be accepted in full payment of the salary; and I am informed that this bill now under consideration contains such a provision.

Mr. BAILEY. I agree with my colleague as to the merits of the proposition, but if the officer does not accept the amount appropriated in the bill he can go into the Court of Claims and recover the entire salary.

Mr. BOATNER. Did not the court first hold that where the appropriation made was less than the salary fixed by law, the Government still owed the officer the balance, and did not the Appropriations Committee then insert the words "to be in full compensation," so as to meet that decision of the court?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. BOATNER. So the Committee on Appropriations admit having, by the mere force of those words, extorted from the officeholder the difference between the amount of his salary as fixed by law and the amount appropriated to pay him.

Mr. SAYERS. No; not extorted. They did not extort anything. They merely said, by law, that the amount appropriated was sufficient.

Mr. FISCHER. Do I understand the gentleman from Texas to hold that an appropriation for a certain amount made in the bill of one year fixes that as the amount of the appropriation for the same purpose every year thereafter?

Mr. SAYERS. No; it only fixes the amount for the year for which the appropriation is made.

Mr. FISCHER. I understood the gentleman to argue that because $2,500 was appropriated for this purpose last year we might not appropriate a larger sum this year.

Mr. SAYERS. I do not take such a position, but I insist that in this case we should be careful as to the precedent we set.

Mr. FISCHER. Suppose you should get $10,000 of appropriation for one of your rivers or harbors this year, would that bar you from asking a larger sum next year?

Mr. SAYERS. Not at all. Now, Mr. Chairman, do I understand that gentlemen on the other side are here asking for increase of salaries? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] is probably "counting his chickens before they are hatched." [Laughter.] His whole argument seems to be based upon the hypothesis that the Republicans are going to carry the election next fall——

Mr. HOPKINS. Oh, no.

Mr. SAYERS. And he wishes his political friends, who, he thinks, are going to hold these positions, to get $3,000 instead of $2,500.

Mr. HOPKINS. That imputation is unworthy of the gentleman from Texas. [Laughter.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, if there were nothing else involved in this proposition than the simple question of the salaries of these inspectors I should not say a word. But the question raised on the proposition to increase the salaries of five Indian inspectors $500 each reaches much further than these officials. There are not less than 200 officials provided for in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill and other appropriation bills whose salaries as fixed by law are from $500 to $2,000 more per annum than the amount which has been appropriated for them during the last two, five, ten, fifteen, and in some cases twenty years. The salaries of nearly all the officials of the Government were determined by laws passed either during the war or in the years immediately succeeding, when we had a depreciated currency and the cost of living was very much greater than it is now, and when the standard of salaries was consequently higher. Now, instead of having changed those laws, they being multitudinous in number, various Congresses, ever since 1874, have gone on gradually reducing the salaries of officials in appropriation bills to amounts believed to be consistent with the duties to be performed and with the conditions and cost of living since we came back to specie payments.

Now, it seems to me that for this House in Committee of the Whole to start out upon the basis assumed by this amendment, that because the law on the statute book, which has not been repealed, provides for a salary of $3,000—I am not certain that it does, for I have an impression that the salaries of these officials were originally fixed by an appropriation bill, but, however that may be, it does not affect the argument—it seems to me that if we are going to concede the argument that we ought not on an appropriation bill to appropriate any less sum for the salary of any official than what is fixed as his salary in the statutes, we are immediately brought to the necessity, if we are to be consistent, of practically increasing the salaries of more than 200 officials of the Government beyond the amounts paid during the last five, ten, or fifteen years, and beyond the amounts fixed in the pending legislative bill, which is soon to come up.

In casting my eyes over that bill, without examining it carefully, I have noticed at least 20 officials whose salaries for several years have been annually carried in the several appropriation bills at a lower figure than that provided by the statute, officers who have gladly accepted as their compensation the amounts thus appropriated, not one of whom has resigned because of insufficient salary. Now, I hope that in this year of our Lord 1896, with this Government borrowing money for the purpose of paying current expenses, gentlemen in the majority in this House do not propose to set the example here (because if it is to be done in this case, then in justice it must be done in the case of all the other of these officials) of practically increasing the salaries of the officials of this Government beyond the salaries of the past two or more years, especially as in this case, where the salary of $2,500 and $4 per day for expenses is ample and no facts have been presented to show otherwise. In view of the condition in which we find our-
